2363. DUKE OF BOURBON.†

"Lo que el mag^{no} Pedro de Burgos ha de desir al S^r Infante por parte de ill^{mo} s^{or} duque de Borbon."

1. The castle of Milan surrendered on the 25th ult., on which day the duke Francesco Sforza went to the camp of the Pope and Venetians, where he remained two days and two nights, but not having succeeded in gaining Como, which he thought would have surrendered, he retired to Lodi.

2. "El aloham^oi donde estan puestos los enemygos unde seguode de tenerse lo que mas pudieren par afamar esta ciubdad y exercito y estracar nes de dins^a (?)"

3. They have practised with the Grisons and with a captain named Lheguene, who has bargained to bring over 1,000 out of 4,000 foot for whom money has been sent to Como.

4. To request his highness to send as many Germans as he can to succor that army, because the Swiss may determine to take part against them; in which case the Grisons might revoke the infantry of Capt. Leguene.

5. If more than 4,000 Germans can be sent, they had better go by Mantua, and not by the Grisons, because the Marquis is a faithful vassal of the Emperor.

6. Pedro de Burgos will be able to inform the Infant of the condition of the passes, because he will not pass himself without being made sure of them by Bartholomew de Mazii and a gentleman of Bourbon's in Como.

2364. EXTRACT of a LETTER from the BISHOP OF LODI.

"in Castris datis."

When the duke of Milan, accompanied with cavalry and infantry of the League, was about to take possession of Como, the Spaniards sent word that they would prevent him if he went with more men than his own retinue. The Duke protested, and returned to our camp. 3,000 lanzknechts will arrive tomorrow. Is displeased at the long stay here. This morning, Aug. 1, 4,000 foot and 500 men-at-arms, with artillery, are being sent to attack Cremona. The duke of Bourbon is fortifying his camp, fearing the French, who are approaching. Today count John Fermo and count Francis de Somaia arrived here from France. They say that the French forces will be here in 10 days. It is thought that Bourbon and the Spaniards will flee on their approach. The duke of Milan will go to Lodi, and perhaps to Cremona, if our forces besiege it. The doctors advise him to go to the baths at Padua. Malatesta Baglioni is commander of the troops sent to Cremona.

2368. FITZWILLIAM to WOLSEY.

R. O.

No news worth writing. The King is merry and in good health. On entering the county of Sussex, he was met at Petworth by the earl of Arundel, lord Delaware, lord Dacres of the South, Sir Davy Owen, the sheriff, and other gentlemen. The officers of the earl of Northumberland, to whom the place belongs, presented him with 6 oxen and 40 wethers, and he had good game and recreation, entertaining those gentlemen who resorted to him in familiar manner and with good words, and presenting them with venison. Since his coming hither, my Lord, the owner thereof, has made him good game, and provided him a goodly present, all of which has not yet come.

He dined yesterday with the bishop of Chichester. There is not within 100 miles a properer and better cast house, more neatly kept, with fairer and pleasanter walks, except the King's houses and Wolsey's. Wishes Wolsey had seen the house, for there are surdry devices, which he has not seen elsewhere. On Monday the King will remove to lord Delaware's. He was pleased with Wolsey's letter, and the copy of Don Fernando's. At the first receipt he believed the news to be unimportant, and not of a truth; now he believes them to be a very lie. Lettere

ii. 4 b.2369. GIO. BATTISTA SANGA to the DATARY (GIBERTO).

Has informed Madame (Louise) and the Council of his commission to go to England. They highly praised his purpose. Desired them, before his departure, to come to some determination, which would furnish him with grounds for persuading the King to declare himself and to make some contribution. By letters from the [Papal] ambassador* the Datary will have learned the protest which the king of England has ordered to be made to the Emperor. It is said the like will be made by the other ambassadors [at the Imperial court]. If thereupon the Emperor refuses to enter the league, the king [Francis] and these lords say they will declare war. Knows some persons of judgment who doubt whether the war will commence this year. It may be commenced if their intrigues in Navarre prosper. The French wish the king of England to invade Flanders, and offer him assistance. Expects to be in England by the time the result of the protestation is known. The French doubt whether the king of England will sound the drum in order to cause others to dance, without any intention of joining in the dance himself. The bishop of Bath is expected daily. Has given the breve and the Datary's letter to Dr. Tayler. Amboise, 3 Aug. 1526.

2370. HERON and LISLE.

Witnesses, on behalf of Roger Heron, to prove the articles objected by him against Sir Wm. Lisle, examined at York, 3 Aug. 18 Hen. VIII.

Sir Edw. Hutton, vicar of Felton, deposes that on last Good Friday Sir Wm. Lisle was talking with Roger Heron after service in the churchyard; but he did not hear Sir William use any ill words, either of the Legate or the lord Warden, but heard him desire Heron to refer the matter betwixt them to two indifferent persons, or else to two men of law. John Lisle, of Shilbottell Wood, Northumberland, and Rauff Lisle, of Cawcy Parke Side, Northumb., say the same; and the latter adds that Sir Wm. said he heard that Wolsey was displeased with him for seizing the ward of young Swynnowe, but he hoped he would be his good lord.

Witnesses on behalf of Sir Wm. Ellerkar, against Sir Wm. Lisle, examined the same day.

John Wetherington, of Wetherington, Northumberland, Esq., about 20 years of age, son-in-law to Sir Wm. Ellerkar, deposes that at Asshot field, about Whitsunday 17 Hen. VIII., Lisle was talking to Ellerkar about certain distresses taken by him from the latter, who, as sheriff, had awarded a replevy of certain cattle wrongfully taken by Lisle from Roger Heron; and he said, "By God's blood, there is nother king nor sheriff that shall take any distress upon my ground but I shall take another for it." Wm. Carlile, of Wetherington, servant to Sir Wm. Ellerkar, about 32 years, deposes that he was with Sir Wm. Ellerkar, when he pursued Lisle, after taking the said cattle. Ellerkar demanded then, in a good and gentle manner, saying, "Sir Wm. Lisle, have we not a God and a king to live under?" To which Lisle, amongst other words, said in a great fume, "By God's blood, there is nother king nor his officers that shall take any distress upon my ground, or have ado within the liberties at Felton, but I shall take another for it, if I be as strong as he, and can be able to make my party good."

John Dowene, of Wetherington, servant to Sir Wm. Ellerkar, 26 years, deposes the same.

2378. [JOHN BISHOP OF LINCOLN TO WOLSEY.]

Was with the abbot of Peterborough on the 30 July. Told him of the favor Wolsey bore him, and what thanks ye gave him for his offer towards your buildings; and that you required no money of him, but promised if he would give it to the honor of God in the building of your college in Oxford, you would cause him to be prayed for as a benefactor. "And a little while he stayed; then asked me the sum. I said he remembered it well. He said, Nay. Then I showed him. To the which he said, he could not call to remembrance such words, but that he would resign, so that he might have convenient time. Thus unjustly he now . . . chithe obliviousness. pleasure how to have him ordered." Has used him gently hitherto at Wolsey's desire. Thinks if he thus "swerve and warble" in his words, he should be made to resign before Michaelmas on a reasonable pension. He is only wasting time, and thinks nobody can see his design. Regrets to see him behaving so lightly after getting the writer to make so many requests to Wolsey on his behalf, "and now to flee the same." To await Wolsey's commands, forbears his journey to Lincoln, and will remain at Lyddington. Written . . . [6th]* Aug.

2380. The NUNCIO in HUNGARY to the POPE†

R. O.

1. Your Holiness will see the news from Varadin by letters from the archbishop of Colocza (Colocensis). The bishop of Bosnia arrived here from the Archbishop, and stated that on Sunday, 15th July, about the first hour, the Turks attacked the castle and a ford at the same time. The defenders killed more than 1,000 Janissaries, as they say. Those at the ford, though they had no more than 40 small ships, which they call "nazadas," about 1,000 horse and 3,000 rustics, sunk one great Turkish ship, and killed many of their men. Only eight of little importance were lost by us. Almericus Zibacha, who brought your brief, had his horse killed. The battle was kept up on both sides till night. During the night the archbishop of Colocza resolved to abandon the ford of Varadin, and retreat to another, two miles off, seeing that with so few ships they could not resist the Turkish fleet, which consisted of 100 ships like ours, 23 galleys and other vessels. The Archbishop is at Baccia, with a few people, and resists the enemy as well as he can.

On the Monday following the Turks retired from the castle, so that our men could water at the Danube. On Tuesday another attack was made, the Turks thinking they would easily succeed, on account of the lowness of the walls; but after fighting all day they were driven off, and many of the Janissaries killed. On Wednesday they began to batter the town on four sides, by night and day. Feared the event, as the castle is weak. The archbishop of Colocza thinks it can be held for eight or ten days, and asks the King for 10,000 men, with whom he will attack the Turkish navy, take the ford, and succour the besieged. Arrangements are now made for sending assistance. When the ford had been lost, the Turks burnt the fort at Futachum, and several other towns across the Danube. Are in much fear for Petra Varadin, as the King cannot succour it, having neither ships nor infantry, except what your Holiness sent. Everything between the Save and Drave must be considered as lost. The King will make a stand at the Drave, and perhaps protect the ford, which will be difficult, considering his plans and his poverty. Have paid the infantry of your Holiness for a month and a half, and agreed to pay them the same amount in Buda. They number 5,000 foot and 200 horse.

R. O.

2. Copy of the letters of baron de Burgio, nuncio at Buda, 5 Aug.

Wrote on the 3rd instant of the taking of Petra Varadin, on the banks of the Danube. When the Turks had taken the castle by a mine, the garrison fought in the courtyard until the blood of Turks and Christians reached to their knees. Ninety alone escaped into the belfry of the church, the only building which was uninjured. As they resolved to defend themselves to the death, the Turks let them go unhurt to the archbishop of Colocza, but cut off the heads of the wounded, and flung them into the Danube. At the same time they stormed and took Vylac, a fort about twice the size of Petra Varadin, about four Hungarian miles distant from it. 600 soldiers only were in it, 300 belonging to your Holiness. What he will do next is uncertain. It will be some days before the King can join his army. It is reported that he intends to go to Tolna, and defend the passage of the Drave. If unsuccessful there, he will retreat to Illyria, because, the bishop of Zagrab and the bann of Croatia being faithful to him, he will not be afraid of treachery, and the province contains many strong places. If he do this, I know not what I shall do, but hope for orders from you by the first courier I sent. The archbishop of Colocza has assembled 4,000 cavalry, who have sworn to die rather than disband or retreat; but the King has advised them to change their purpose, and fight only where they will be of service. Of 500 horsemen who crossed the Danube to attack the Turks, part have been taken and part killed. The Queen is still at Buda, and no plans are fixed for her departure. Expects she will not be able to leave when she wishes.

P.S.—One of the 90 who escaped from Petra Varadin has arrived here, and narrated the whole affair. He says they did not surrender, but that some of the Turkish officers saved them from the multitude. The Turk says he means to take the kingdom, and will not retire until he has fought with the King. Among the said 90 there are some of your Holiness's infantry, and I have given them a garment each on account of their valor. It is said that Vylac is taken and burnt. The 500 horse who were thought to have been destroyed have returned, with the loss of only 25 or 30 of their number. The archbishop of Kolocza and Bacchia, who was the chaplain of the King in Syrmisch, desires a new office and bishopric, saying that Syrmisch no longer belongs to the King, and he has lost the revenue of Bacchia.

6 Aug., Buda. News came last night of the loss of Vylac, Athia, Zatha, and all the fortresses as far as Erdend, which is a mile from the Drave. The King is now setting off to defend the Drave, and asks the Queen to send some Viennese artillery. He has written to know if I can send him any money. Perhaps it would be as well to give him the little that remains, not because he can do any good with it, but because it is only a small sum, and he is in such necessity. Will act according to your letters.

R. O.

After his last letters, on Friday the 27th ult., although some say it was Wednesday, the Turks attacked six or seven times the castle of Petra Waradin, and were repulsed with great loss. Their corpses filled the ditches. The Hungarians could not bear the stench. Afterwards the Sultan undermined the walls, and blew them up with gunpowder. Of 1,000 Hungarians in the castle 100 only escaped to a small rock, who afterwards surrendered on condition of their lives. The Turk then attacked Vylac, where the body of St. John de Capistrano is buried. The King is at Tolona collecting forces. Is uncertain of the result. All the nobles and prelates are with the King. Every 100 peasants have to furnish 20 horses. Had reinforcements been sent in time, Petra Waradin might have been saved. Buda, 6 Aug.

Have done what I could to seize Wm. Gilbank, who has broken the sanctuary of St. John's of Colchester, and is now in the "Crowche Freerys" there. Went with Sir Geoffrey Gates, and asked the Prior in your name to deliver him until you could examine him; but they refused, saying their privilege is as great as St. John's. Gilbank was in the choir, near the high altar, "where I durst not to enterprise." Before leaving, saw a watch set for him. This morning, Mr. Broke, the judge, came to Colchester, and I went with him, Gates and Sir Ric. Fitzlewis to the Friars. The Prior showed us a transcript of a bull declaring his privilege, which he intends to show to you. Asked him if he had any grant of the King's ancestors for liberty of sanctuary. He said he had none to show, but supposed there was one in the head house of the Order. Gilbank, on being asked why he took sanctuary, said it was for felony; and asked for a coroner, before whom he confessed it. Advised the coroner to defer the abjuration till we know your pleasure. 2388. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

Since the French king's letter to his ambassador here, which gives no notice of any disasters in Italy, I have had a long discourse with his ambassador touching the treaty.* After much discussion it is now concluded, in better form than the minute sent to you. The French king cannot now treat with the Emperor to your prejudice, and is obliged to the payment of the sums due to you from the Emperor. If, then, you can avoid entering the league, I shall consider you the most happy of all princes. By a summary of the news from Rome, France and Venice, you will see there is no truth in the distress of the Venetians. The duke of Urbino assaulted one of the gates of Milan, and repulsed the Spaniards. Bourbon has arrived there with 400 men, and bills of exchange for 100,000 ducats; so that the news written from the Archduke to the lady Margaret "be clearly brags, and of no truth." The Papal and Venetian armies retired to Marignan, waiting for the coming of the Swiss. Trusting that you will enter the league, or contribute to its expences, the Pope and the Venetians have rejected the Emperor's offers. They have been hot and urgent in their persuasions, but I have been as cold. How long they will remain contented I doubt. The lady Margaret has sent hither the provost of Cassel, minding to recall the Emperor's ambassador. I propose they shall attend your Grace, in company with Dr. Knight, at Winchester on Lady Day. I have devised certain letters for Ireland, which I send for your signature. Hampton Court, 11 Aug. Signed.

2389. DIET of SPIRES.

Translation of news from Spire.

The Emperor has enjoined on the princes and estates, "suprimation (sous privation ?) de leurs regalles et ce qu'ilz tiennent de l'Empire," not to interfere with Lutheranism, for which he will provide shortly.

The princes are displeased, and intend to break up the diet and go home. The Archduke leaves in 10 days for Lower Austria, and is in danger of incurring considerable loss. Nothing of importance will be concluded, for the diet will end in division. The duke of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse are here. They eat flesh on Fridays and Saturdays, and their preachers preach the Lutheran heresy every two days. It is said that the king of Poland and Hungary has defeated certain Turks. The quarrels between the princes here are not all appeased.

Fears that if they separate without providing for the affairs of the empire, Germany will be in greater division than it has been for many years, and that the commons will rise against the Church, for most of the temporal princes are Lutherans. Spires, 11 Aug.

2390. DIET OF SPIRES.

R. O.

Decision of the Imperial Senate about the new doctrines.

The Emperor's foresaid instructions to John Hannart, his ambassador at the Imperial diet, state that the injunctions issued by the Diet of Worms have not been obeyed, and repeat his desire that they should be carried out. It is proposed to hold a general council of all Christendom in Germany; and the Nuncio has promised to persuade the Pope to sanction it.

An assembly of the German nation will meet meanwhile on St. Martin's Day at Spires; and all princes and states are requested to attend, or send one or more councillors.

Letters will be sent to the princes, and chiefly to those who have universities in their dominions, that the learned men may discover what is disputable in the new doctrines, and exhibit it at the assembly. Meanwhile care must be taken that the true word of God is preached. Complaints of the people against the Apostolic See, and of seculars against ecclesiastics, will be considered.

2391. JOHN BISHOP OF LINCOLN to WOLSEY.

By the negligence of my priest I did not receive your letters dated 25 July until 9 Aug. I understand by it your pleasure concerning Peterborough and Spalding. The abbot of Peterborough is not the man I took him for. He almost goes from everything he speaks. As I wrote, he swerved from his promise, and came down to 400*l.*, and begged me not to write to you till his monk came home, when he would send me his final resolution. The monk arrived on Thursday, but was not with me till Tuesday after. The monk made a great tale of the Abbot's expences, and then offered to give your college 400 marks, and after a little pause 500, under certain conditions. I said I marvelled, for he had promised a much larger sum, at least 400*l.*; and I refused to take his message, urging him to persuade his master to keep his word, and do it with a free will, and that without delay. He then asked for delay; and as he desired a long time, I suppose he will make suit to you to be content with 400 or 500 marks. I think it right, if he will not keep his promise, that he ought to resign on a pension; and he would rather spend 2,000*l.* than do so. I stayed the deliverance of your letters to the abbot of Peterborough and the prior of Spalding till I hear from you. He does all he can to prevent the prior of Spalding from resigning,—not like a wise or kind man, but to keep you from your honorable pleasure and purpose. All parts hereabout are rejoiced for the good order you have taken in Leicestershire. I hope the commissions will be well executed. Ludington, 11 Aug.

R. O. Clarencieux is returned from Scotland, and Patrick Sinclair comes
St. P. i. 150. with him from the king of Scots with letters, of which Wolsey sends copy "totted in the margin." Sinclair has always taken the King's part, and advertised Magnus of the French doings. James has taken the government, and expelled the followers of Albany. Has ordered Sinclair to repair to the King at Winchester. At your Grace's manor of Hampton Court, 12 Aug. Signed.

R. O. Arrived yesterday at Blois. Heard from Dr. Tayler that Bourbon had
St. P. vi. 342. arrived at Genoa, routed the Venetians before Milan, and compelled the Duke to surrender, offering him a pension of 30,000 ducats and the city of Como, but he does not keep his word. The Pope had been discomfited before Sienna, which is a great drawback to his affairs. Cardinal Colonna, the duke of Sessa, and Hugo de Moncada have raised large bodies, and troubled the Pope, who is in the greatest possible distress. He is sending to England J. Bap. Sanga, who has been here with the French king. They think here that the Pope will be compelled to make terms with the Emperor, and have therefore treated his emissary more graciously. I leave today for Amboise, hoping to speak with my Lady. Francis is gone on a pilgrimage to Tours. Blois, 12 Aug. Signed.

R. O.

On the 26th July received his letters by his chaplain, Dr. Benet, but could not send an answer, owing to his short stay, and asked for a month's time to deliberate. Cannot come now, as he is somewhat diseased, and fears to travel "this untemperate time," and is also expecting the King next week. Wolsey writes that he has ordered his house discreetly as yet, but now, from age and imbecility, cannot attend to it as heretofore, and accordingly urges him to resign. Thanks him for his commendation, but is not so aged or impotent of body or wit, but that he is able to exercise his office to the pleasure of God, increase of good religion, and wealth of his house. R. O.

In accomplishing your commandment given me at my last being with you at Hampton Court, I returned thither on Saturday last, fully prepared to observe the appointment signified by you to the King for the arrival of the ambassadors of Burgundy at Winchester. But as it was commonly reported in your great chamber that you would not give audience any more that night, I returned to my lodging. The next day I waited at your place till night, when my fear returned, so that I could abide no longer. I was informed that Francis, your physician, was sick, and therefore upon Monday returned diligently to London, leaving my chaplain to certify the cause of my departure. Sir Thomas More told me it was your pleasure that I should accompany the ambassadors of Burgundy to the court ; but he did not tell me they were here. I was told they were at Kingston ; and on Sunday I sent my chaplain to the hostelry of the Crane there, where they were said to be lodged, and was informed they were in their chamber. So I have been mistaken. I have caused Sir John Wallop to tell them that the breach of their former appointment of repairing to court by the Assumption of Our Lady was owing to my sickness. As it is not appointed that they shall be at court before Sunday, they will remain here till Friday. That day they will make their dinner at Kingston, and lodge at Guildford ; next day to Winchester. Wallop will accompany them to Kingston, where I shall join them ; and as my sickness is not contagious, I will visit your Grace on Thursday. Excuses himself in consequence of illness. Cromwell's letter and comfortable words to his servant have "greatly joyed mine heart." Has comforted his wife with them, so that he trusts she will recover shortly from her disease. God forbid but Cromwell should take leisure to conclude the matter circumspectly. one Roger Heron. The former says that Lisle forcibly entered his lordship with a company of a hundred persons, and carried off 40 head of "noote." On being pursued, and asked why he had done so, he said it was on account of a replevin awarded against him by Ellerear, as sheriff of Northumberland, adding, that "neither the King nor any other his officers, if he mought be a party to them, should meddle within his Lordship." Heron says that in a dispute between him and Lisle the latter said, "What! Meanest thou to strive with me? Wilt thou win anything at my hands? I have ruffled with the Warden and also with the Cardinal, and trust to pluck him by the nose." The vicar of Felton, and a kinsman and a servant of Lisle's, were examined as witnesses, but could not confirm this. The vicar is a canon of Brinkbourne* and a curate of Lisle's. Thinks there was collusion, as they had all seen copies of the complaint. Sir William and his son for these and other matters are committed to Pountefret Castle. "Justice had good place at York with goodly appearance of gentlemen;" 16 persons suffered. Has been with the justices to the assizes at Newcastle, where were also Sir Chr. Dacre, Sir Will. Eures, Sir Thos. Tempest, Serjeant Fairfax, Rob. Bowes, and others of my lord of Richmond's council. There was never so great an assize with so good appearance of gentlemen, that no one was afraid to complain or give evidence. 16 persons were executed; many of the great surnames and headsmen of Tynedale and Riddesdale; two of the Fenwicks; and others of the Shaftehouse, Pottes, Haulles and Hedeleez. Such a thing was never seen before in these parts.

Has sent to my lord of Cumberland the commission for keeping warden courts on the West Marches. Has delivered others to Sir Chr. Dacre and Sir Will. Eures for the East and Middle Marches. Eures has taken upon him to be lieutenant of the Middle Marches and keeper of Tynedale and Riddesdale, with the fees assigned by Wolsey. He says he will give the substance of those fees to the gentlemen of the country that the King may be better served; but he is very desirous to have my lord of Richmond's fee of 10*l*. Has appointed with the Council to be again at Newcastle before Martinmas. There is a good and honest gentleman, Cuthbert Radcliff, sheriff of Northumberland, son of Sir Edw. Radcliff. Has consulted with Eures about bringing Tynedale-men to good order, without the inhabitants being charged with pledges to my lord of Richmond's council. Tyndale-men should not be encouraged to come to Yorkshire with their pledges. Suggests that 12 of the principal surnames in Tynedale be always kept as pledges, and renewed three times a year. Sir Anthony Ughtred should apply to their maintenance the wages of six or seven soldiers of Berwick, who might thus be spared. The Borders never kept better rule. Will do his best now at his return to these parts to put my lord of Richmond's household in order. Sheriffhutton, 17 Aug. Signed.

Received his letters dated 20 May, commanding him to pay within 20 days to the earl of Ormond the "halfynde" of the subsidy and other revenues, amounting to 800*l*. Did not receive the letters till St. Laurence eve, before which he had paid over to Ormond all that he had received; but it did not amount to the said sum, as will appear by the account of the under-treasurer. Hopes [Henry] will not listen to the surmises of his adversaries till the truth be tried. Is bound to him, not only by his oath of allegiance, but because, after being brought up in his service, Henry made him treasurer, and gave him lands worth 100 mks. a year. 3. Articles to be shown to the King by lord Leonard Grey, on the earl of Kildare's behalf, touching the earl of Ormond's misdemeanors since the departure of the commissioners.

1. Though Ormond has been ordered to take no coyne or livery of the King's subjects without their consent, he has continued to do so, in Kilkenny and Tipperary, not only for his horsemen and kerne, but for his masons, carpenters, tailors, in his own works, and for his hunts, viz., 24 men and 60 greyhounds, and other number of men and dogs for deer-hunting, and a third for martin-hunting, charging the King's subjects to the value of 2,000 mks. yearly. 2. He occupies the King's manors of Callan in Kilkenny, and Kilmore and others in Tipperary, contrary to the indenture, and also takes the King's escheats, fines, and forfeitures. 3. He sent gunners to defend the castle of Okerull, the King's enemy, against the Deputy. 4. He offered to the Brenys, the most powerful of any of the Irishry of this land, to give them their desires in a controversy he had with them, if they would take his part against the Deputy; which they refused. 5. Three of his servants were present at the murder of the bishop of Leighlin* by the abbot of Dusk's son, Ormond's near kinsman, and he succored the Abbot when the Deputy "persecuted" him for the murder. 6. His servants burnt and robbed a town of the Deputy's, called Lyvetiston in Kildare, killing 17 men and women, some of them with child, "and one of them that fled out of the fire to the church was slain on the high altar." Yet he retains them in his service, and refuses to pay the compensation assessed by the commissioners. 7. He keeps a ward of evil-disposed persons at Arclow by the sea, who rob all passers by, and ravish women. When the King's subjects were chased by Bretons before the peace, and took land at Arclow, they were so ill used that they were glad to yield to the Bretons. 8. The Irish and some of Ormond's servants took prisoner Thos. Fitzmaurice, the Deputy's kinsman, whose father was slain in the King's service when the duke of Norfolk was in Ireland. 9. The churches in most part of Kilkenny and Tipperary are in such decay by provision that there is no divine service kept; and he and his wife maintain provisors against the earl's (Ormond's?) son being archbishop of Cashel,* notwithstanding the King's letters in his favor. They despise the spiritual sword. 10. Before his sudden departure he levied 4*d.* a head on all the King's subjects above 12 years in Kilkenny, towards his expenses, and appointed collectors, as if it had been granted by Parliament. 11. He sends to Robt. Cowly over sea to indite complaints against Kildare at his own pleasure, and has given him his signet to seal them. 12. In case Ormond mentions again Kildare's letter to the earl of Desmond, the truth is that he wrote to appoint a meeting with him to ask his aid against the rebels, not knowing of his misdemeanor to the King. The Council took it to proceed of no evil intent. 13. He took 40 mks. of the seneschal of Wexford for taking part with Kildare against the rebels.

"To make my preface and ceremony to you (most famous lantern of grace) condign, or yet of compendious conveyance to express my purpose, I have enterprised the treatise ensuing without deliberation, of good zeal to instruct your mastership, my poor mind for the reformation of Ireland." Does not pretend to as much experience as others, but fears that some who have experience would discourage the King in his proceedings, as they would be in danger of losing their influence and lands, to which they have slender title. Has tripartited the treatise;—the first part to show the occasions of the decay of the land, the increase of Irishmen, and the enfeeblishing of the King's subjects;—the second to point out the remedies, which are subdivided into two parts, first for a general reformation, and second for a particular reformation, preparatory to the other;—and the third, how to enlarge the King's revenues, so as to support the charges during the time of the reformation, and bring in a profit afterwards.

The great cause of the desolation of the land appears to have been the remissness of former kings arising out of the dissensions between the Houses of York and Lancaster. Whoever was in possession made it his whole study to keep out his adversary; and much of the King's inheritance, both in the earldom of Ulster, which belongs to the King by his mother, and which once brought in the yearly rent of 30,000 marks, and of the inheritance of divers lords of England, have been usurped both by the King's subjects and by Irishmen. Now that the King inherits the titles both of York and Lancaster, he will be better able to look after Ireland. There has been a similar dispute for the rule of Ireland between the Geraldines and the Butlers. The earls of Kildare and Desmond come of one stock, and have always held with the house of York, as was seen in the days of the King's father, "when an organ-maker's son (Lambert Simnel), named one of king Edward's sons, came into Ireland, was by the Geraldines received and crowned king in the city of Dublin, and with him the earl of Kildare's father sent his brother Thomas with much of his people, who with the earl of Lincoln, Martin Swart and others, gave a field unto the King's father, where the earl of Kildare's brother was slain." Perkin Warbeck was also assisted by the earl of Desmond. Ormond and his kinsmen are called the Butlers. Their lands lie between those of Kildare, called the Geraldines of the East, and Desmond, called the Geraldines of the West, "which interposition hath done good in times past," and must be preserved. The Butlers have always been loyal to the House of Lancaster, for which the earl of Ormond was attainted in the time of Edward IV.

2. Another cause of the desolation of the land has been that the lords and gentlemen having marchlands have given up residing upon them, and gone to England or to the heart of the English Pale, leaving their lands undefended.

3. The third and principal cause has been that the great rulers have each had his Irish judge, who decrees according to Irish law. The rulers themselves speak Irish rather than English, to gain the favor of the common people. Scarcely a word of English is heard in the county of Kildare, which is one of the four shires of the English Pale. Irish habits are also worn for the most part, "and tonsures above the ears, with overlips and Irish garments," so that they cannot be distinguished from Irishmen, except that the latter have better manners, and are more obedient to order. Doubtless the earl of Kildare, being deputy, has power to reform all these enormities, especially in his own dominions, so it must be supposed he has reasons for tolerating them. Some think he does not wish the King's laws to press too heavily on his own kinsmen, so that they should lose their prescription of ancient customs, viz., to be lambs or wolves just as their captain is inclined, who can only be charmed "by one medicine, that is, to have the King's sword borne before himself, and when that is once seen, all the wolves be converted to lambs." This was shown in the days of Kildare's father, who kicked and winced when any other deputy was made, and made him glad to fly to England.

Lately, on the duke of Norfolk's arrival in Ireland as the King's lieutenant, O'Neil's near kinsman, a great friend of Kildare's, was the first that invaded the English Pale; so that the Duke, upon Whitsunday, three days after landing, was obliged to set forward his army to resist O'Neil, and he himself to advance next day, till he chased him to the wood, where O'Neil said he would chase the English home in the same ships they came by, and compel the King to send back Kildare, whether he would or not. He afterwards said that he awaited the arrival of his cousin, and that if he did not come by Christmas he would subvert all Ireland. Both during Norfolk's time and during the deputyship of Ormond, all the troubles were occasioned by Kildare's adherents; and as soon as the sword was given to Kildare, all the wolves became lambs, and O'Neil became so humble as to "bear the sword before my lord of Kildare, covering his shorn poll with a coif, which was a monstrous sight to behold." The King's sword in Ireland is like King Arthur's Siege Perilous, which only Sir Lancelot's son could sit in with safety. "This vulgar Irish tongue induceth the habit, the habit induceth the conditions and inordinate laws; and so the tongue, habit, laws and conditions maketh mere Irish."

The King's courts being only at Dublin in a corner of the land, and no commissioners sent to other parts, makes the people incline to the Brehon laws. The great possessioners in the heart of the Pale keep "little ordinary houses, as they were in a land of peace;" leaving the burden of defending the Marches to the poor March gentlemen, who are therefore fain to make favor with the Irish and intermarry with them. Those who have great possessions in the Church now dwell in England, letting their homes go to waste, and contributing nothing to the defence of the land. No dignity falls vacant now, but some English abbot or prior who has too much already makes labor for it first. Except Dublin, Drogheda, and a very few lords' houses, all the English Pale has of late become Irish. The earl of Ormond, on the other hand, having no charge or profit of the King's subjects, cares only for himself and his dependents.

4. The Council, being in a corner of the land, are satisfied if the part of four shires called the English Pale be at peace; in which case they report to the King that the land is in good quiet, caring no more for the rest of it than the Venetians do for the Scots. They have thus diminished the King's jurisdiction from a large forest to a narrow park.

Besides the four shires named the English Pale are seven others adjoining, "as by the platt may appear," viz., Carolagh, Waysford, Kilkenny, Tipperary, Waterford, Limerick, Cork and Kerry, besides many large places like Connaghe, containing many more good towns than the English Pale, without whose assistance the English would have to withdraw; "for they have drawn themselves to the door of the passage at the sea coast, where with policy and manhood they might inhabit further within the main land." If the King would break that narrow English Pale, and make a large English forest, he might have advertisement of his subjects in the West as well as in the East; for at present when the King is informed that all Ireland is in peace, Desmond and the Brennys are making war upon Ormond and others. As the people look upon their governors as their sovereigns they should be taught their natural duty of allegiance by sending over a discreet mean gentleman of England, not above the degree of a knight, armed with the King's authority, and with such a company as might be supported out of the King's revenues, who would see the disposition both of Kildare and Ormond towards this particular reformation, by which the King would be guided in making his promotion. An English bachelor knight bore the rule 16 years when there were five earls together in Ireland (viz., Ulster, Ormond, Kildare, Desmond, and Louth). This mean man should call a Parliament, to abolish the jurisdiction of Brehons, and establish itinerant judges,—to enact that every man reputed himself the King's subject shave his over lip, let his hair grow to cover his ears, and wear bonnets and English coats. If it be objected that such articles are costly, let them diminish the superfluity of saffron on their shirts and of silk on their jacks; that the gentry send their sons to learn English to the cities and port towns, or to such gentlemen as "use English conduct;" that none speak Irish under great penalties to any who understand English; that instead of the cries Cramabo and Butlerabo the King's subjects cry only St. George.

My lord Cardinal's grace might get from Rome the Pope's jurisdiction in Ireland for seven years for a yearly payment of 1,000 or 2,000 ducats, or perhaps for 10,000 ducats ready money, as the Pope does not know the King's subjects from his rebels, so that they are encouraged to remain disloyal. He might then take from Irishmen all their benefices, and get for his own use all the money paid to offices at Rome for Irish causes. Discreet personages should be assigned to redress disorders in the marches. The towns of the English Pale being sore decayed by resort among Irishmen, penalties should be enacted against buying and selling in Irishmen's country, and private treaties with Irishmen to be forbidden on pain of death. No ships to lade or discharge goods, except at Dublin, Drogheda, Waterford, Rosse, Youghale, Cork, Kinsale, Limerick and Galway. The Emperor, French king, and king of Portugal to be written to, that proclamations be made in their dominions accordingly. No hay is made except in the English Pale, and the horses and cattle are fed with corn, which causes scarcity, and many beasts die. Husbandmen, therefore, should not be allowed to use their meadow ground as pasture till after mowing time. It would be a good thing to subdue McMorrow's and the Burnes' country to the King. It belongs by inheritance to the duke of Norfolk and other Englishmen. It is commodious and fertile, and lies between the earl of Kildare, the earl of Ormond, the county of Waysheforde, and the sea. No Irish can enter, save through the said Earls, who cannot deny they have power to subdue the country; but Kildare would probably allege that all the Irish would unite to resist it, and would be too strong for them.

Does not think they would be more likely to rise than when Fercolyn was taken from the Tooles, the Ferture from the Birnes, &c. Kildare favors McMorow too much to see him subdued. They are near kinsmen, and the Earl helped him against the King's subjects. It is said the Earl intends to marry his daughters to Cayhare McMaryart Ogge, second captain of McMorow's country who keeps the country of O'Drone, Norfolk's inheritance, as he married his other daughter to O'Coner. If Kildare and Ormond had as much right to the country as Norfolk, they would find means to subdue it without a general insurrection. Advises McMorow's fee of 100 marks from the King to be stopped, as he does no service for it. Meantime the castles of Fernes and O'Drone may be won; and Sir John Fitzgarrot of Desmond, the earl of Desmond's uncles, lords Barry, Roche and Cogan, the Knight of the Valley, Cormoke Oge, McCarty Reaghe, McCartie More, McMorrys, and O'Connor Kerry might be separated from the earl of Desmond, and bound to act against him. By their help, Dungarvan castle also might be taken,—a great place of resort for English and other fishers.

The King should appoint as lieutenant an active and politic nobleman, with experience of the land, like the duke of Norfolk, and give him a sufficient army, 4,000 men, light horse, gunners, morrispikes, bows and bills, all quick and hardy men. Prices must be fixed for the victuals of the army;—gentlemen, 2*d.* a meal; yeomen, 1½*d.*; 24 sheaves of oats for 2*d.*, which will suffice a horse for a day and night without hay. Hay is 20 lbs. for 1*d.* Captains should be appointed in every parish to go with the constables, and see that the fare is sufficient. Oats are 6*d.* a bushel, twice the size of London bushels. Meat is as follows: a quarter of cow beef, 14*d.*; of the second, 12*d.*; of the third, 10*d.*; 4 qrs. of mutton, 12*d.* Other things can be rated by the clerk of the market. O'Nele, O'Donell, and McWilliam should be persuaded, by promise of the King's favor, to help the lieutenant, and not to maintain Irishmen, and to surrender their lands to the King, taking them back at a light chief rent. If they will not come to terms, they can be set by the ears to destroy each other. The lieutenant can then begin with McMorow, accuse him of not helping the King, though he has a fee, and of keeping the castle of Fernes and O'Drone, which is the Duke's inheritance, and offer that if he will yield to the lieutenant, give up his kerne, &c., he and the gentlemen of his kin shall have land at a rent of 4*d.* per arable acre. If they will not agree, the lieutenant must take their castles, put wards in them, make villages and surround them with ditches, placing two or three hagbushes in each. Paths wide enough for 20 men must be cut through their hazel and willow wood, which they reckon fastnesses. The oak wood need not be touched. They will then be without succor, and the Pale will be enlarged 200 miles by 20. In Leinster and other parts of Ireland there are remains of castles and towns which could be easily repaired. When McMorow's and the Byrnes' country is taken, a number of men who were born in Ireland should be sent out of England to inhabit it, and the same when other countries have been won. While taking the above countries, staples for victual should be fixed at Rosse, Arc[low] and Carloghe. Next, the same way should be taken with O'Connor. Staples and garrisons must be placed at Kesheboyne, Rathangan, Monaster Orya, and Darcy's Castle. The woods are already cut. He has married Kildare's daughter, and will expect his help. These countries are the key of Ireland; and Melagham, O'Molmoye, O'Doyne, O'Dymsey, O'More and O'Mehagher, will be dearly won. The army must thus proceed as far as the Shannon. Cressets must be prepared to be lighted on the top of all the "pylles," when Irishmen enter the country. As each country is won, the land should be let in freeholds, at 4*d.* an arable acre. When it is once brought to quiet and order, the King may by Act of Parliament enlarge his realm as he pleases.

Some may object, that if Ireland were quiet and prosperous, the lieutenant might practise with the King's enemies, but that while they are in division as now, it is impossible. But the King's distant realms are as obedient as those in which he lives. To have dominion without obedience or profit, is a void thing of derision.

Should not advise all Ireland to be under one lieutenant, unless he were English, but that there should be five captains with fixed provinces, with a standing fee. It would be unlikely that they should all unite in rebellion. It would be better to have the King's officers in every quarter of the land, trying who should best win the King's favor, than that the charge of the whole land should be with one man residing in a corner, who never resorts to the extreme parts, and is not regarded there. The lords of the Pale prefer a man dwelling amongst them who takes no care for the rest of the land.

R. O.

Since writing last the King has had great cheer with my lord of Arundel, lord Delaware, lord Lisle, and here with my lord of Winchester. When the King was at Warblington, Suffolk wrote that one of his servants had fallen sick of plague at Woodstock before he left, and, being removed into the town, died; and that another person had also died in the town, and that he wrote, as he heard the King intended to go thither. The King was displeased, and told Fitzwilliam to write, saying that he marvelled the Duke did not remove when he had the King's orders, and that he did not inform him of the servant's death immediately, that he might have altered his "giests," for now he knew not which way to go, and had lost the opportunity of seeing his daughter. On receiving this letter the Duke sent a servant to make his excuse to the King, who forgave him his "mysfaicte," and told the servant a right good tale to be shown to him. The King has now determined his giests according to the enclosed copy. The Princess will meet him at Langley. The King treats Patrique Saynteler familiarly and well. Hears that Wolsey is going soon to the More. If he will remain at Hampton Court next week, and dine at Chertsey on Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, Fitzwilliam will meet him in the forest, and bring him where he can kill a stag with his bow, and another with his greyhounds. His cousin Hennage can write him word of Wolsey's pleasure. Winchester, 18 Aug. Signed.

Was glad to receive his letters. Has done all he ordered. The Duke and Senate at first thought it hard that in the present dangers the King and Wolsey should send them no assistance, as they expected; but now, on further explanation, when they have ascertained the Pope's mind, they will do all that Wolsey wishes.

R. O.

We were lately in doubt about the coming of the fresh German troops, but are now informed by a note from the Nuncio with the Archduke to the Pope, that they will not come without the Emperor's permission, which cannot be obtained, as all the roads into France are stopped. The said note came with great difficulty, as all the roads are blockaded, and every one passing is examined. A few days ago a junction was effected by the enemy (certa illorum unio) near the Val Camonica in the diocese of Breseia, and Camillo Ursino has accordingly gone thither with a strong force. They are willing enough, "sed non habent bona crura propter defectum pecuniarum."

Letters from the Nuncio in Hungary, dated Buda, 4th inst., state that the Turks are assaulting the citadel of Petra Varadin, which is not far from Belgrade. After repeated failures the great Turk himself assaulted it with artificial fire and divers engines, and succeeded in destroying the castle. Ninety only escaped, whom the Turks spoiled and let go. He has now sent for workmen to rebuild the place, and intends to attack a neighbouring fortress. The king of Hungary was encamped at Tonna, waiting for aid from Bohemia. He will then have a large army, and may defeat the Turk. Gauricus, the astronomer, said the other day to the Doge that he would forfeit his head if the Turk was not either defeated, killed, or taken. He has often divined, but I put no faith in him.

On the 14th my lord of Bath at Amboise had a long communication with the King and with my Lady. On the 16th the Venetian ambassador told him that the castellan of Mus, in the pay of the Venetians, took prisoner the Venetian ambassadors that were going into France, and demands 7,000 scudi for ransom. They have heard from Peter of Navarre that the Emperor is preparing a navy and 7,000 men to send the Viceroy into Naples, but it cannot be ready till September. If, therefore, he does not speed at Genoa, Peter will collect ships and lie in wait for the Viceroy. Francis is preparing at his own cost 12 great ships, to which the Venetians and the Pope contribute nothing. The duke of Milan is with the army of the League, and has received 4,000 scudi. The Archbishop is, therefore, unwilling to meddle in public matters without letters of request from the King and Wolsey. 2416. CLERK to [WOLSEY].

Arrived at Amboise on Sunday the 12th. Was met on the road by three or four bishops, and others, who excused themselves for not having a greater company, as the King was gone on a pilgrimage to Tours, and with him the nobility, except such as were left to wait upon my Lady. Proposed to visit Madame next day, but was told by the bp. of Chartres that she was unwell, and the King would be home the next night. Was with the King on the 14th. Presented their letters, which he took with him apart to the window and read; and as there were many in presence, he had them into another chamber. He then expressed his regret at Dr. Tayler's proposed departure, saying, however, that he hoped that I would employ myself, as he had done, in advancing their common affairs. He then said that he was greatly bound to the King's highness, and "also all his posterity to be ever his perpetual slaves. And in this matter, I assure your Grace, he had very earnest and long language." Among other words he made use of this similitude, "like as when a man will [take] any great leap or skip, the more he doth go back-[wards] and recoil himself, the further is his leap; so the stroke of love and amity, which by these wars hath now recoiled and put backward by the dissolu[tion] of them, shall be doubtless the further extended." He rejoiced that the reciprocal obligation had passed England, for the Emperor's ambassador would have tempted him with new offers, but he was so bound to his "cousin, the king of England, that without him he might do nothing." He said he had granted for the war in Italy 20,000 ducats a month, besides the 40,000*l.*, with other advantages, and that he did not think much of the coming of Bourbon into Italy, or the taking of the castle of Milan.

He was so long in talking thus, "that, then being Our Lady Even, evensong time drew on, insomuch that my Lady sent him word thereof, and that she would gladly speak with us before evensong. Thus leaving me no space to play my part, his Majesty, without any more words, willed us to repair unto my Lady." This we did, delivering our letters. She asked about our conversation with the King. Conversed much upon the amity of the two Princes. "She asked me how I thought they should please the King's highness;" and I replied that I had come there to advance the League, and exhort them to do what was most beneficial to their own interests; that, remembering the union of the two kingdoms, and the manifold occasions of its interruption, she should, by her great wisdom and prudence, prevent its dissolution. I said that your Grace offered your services to assist in this; and, "whatsoever hath been written out of England from her orators or elsewhere, [I] was not come hither to renew old sores, or to p[ut] in question any title or any other thing displa[cent] unto her hearing." Certain ma[tters], of further conjunction between the realms, had been spoken of in England; but I was commissioned to propose nothing but what was agreeable to herself. She replied that she had been most willingly ruled by Wolsey's advice in these matters, and whatever I had to say to her I should speak it openly, and she would do the best to further it. "Thus, with general words, not touching none other specialties, I made no more business with her at th[at] time." She said we should have time hereafter to speak more at leisure.

"I cannot forget to advertise your Grace how, at th[is] my first audience, there was in my Lady's cham[ber], and fast by her side at my coming in, two goodly [and] well favoured children, and, as I understood aft[erwards], they were the King's children,—the King's daughter and the [King's] younger son. And after that I had delivered the K[ing's] highness' and your Grace's letters unto my Lady, a[nd I] standing somewhat aloof whiles that she read th[em], the King's son, unknown unto me at that time what he was, came and said, 'Soies les tresbien venu, Mons. l'ambassadeur. Me voulez vous mesner veoi[r] mes freres? I having my mind totally occupied with such matters as I did intend to speak unto my Lady, had little mind or fantasie to harky[n] to the child's words, thinking that they had been some children brought in for the ladies' dalliance and pastime, and gave him no answer as the[n]. He still pressed me, replying the same words again. I, willing to avoid him, answered a[n]d said 'Ouy, mon amy; ouy, ouy.' He, hearing that, drew nearer me, and, taking me by the hand, said with a louder voice, 'Voyr, Monsr. l'Ambassadeur, m[c] voulez vous mesner veoir mes freres?' With that my Lady and other lords there about began to laugh; whereby, and calling to my remembrance what the child had said unto me, I then perceived that they were the King's children; which known, with due reverence I kneeled down and kissed both their hands, making recommendatio[ns] in the King's highness's name. My Lady then said that he had studied for that lesson half an hour before. I said unto my Lady that it should be great pity that he should come there as his brethren be, and that it should be better that his brethren were brought there as he is."

On the 17th kept his chamber, having caught cold by riding in the rain, when Tayler went to the council. It appears by letters of the 10th from the Pope's captain, that Langes had been in Switzerland, but as he brought no money the diet there passed an unfavorable resolution. He says he hears nothing of the King's army by sea, whereby their enemies get great advantage. The Grisons are on good terms with the Emperor. All the blame of this is attributed to the French king, who does not keep his promises. The only remedy will be to send an army against Flanders or Burgundy. Cremona is not yet taken. 2418. GHINUCCI to [WOLSEY].

After his last of the 17th, was with his Holiness about the college. He has granted the bulls at Wolsey's desire. Nothing has been changed in the first. In the second the Pope thinks "pro Sedis Apostolica . . ." there should be added "de consensu fundatorum," and he thinks that in the former bull those words were ap[pended]. He believes the bull will satisfy Wolsey. In the third, some alteration was made in the words, not in the meaning, to suit the style of the court. The Pope wishes the Holy See had other as zealous members as the King and Wolsey. He wished besides to see the list that was transmitted of students in the foresaid college, and said that he saw all arrangements made for the college as if he had beheld them with his own eyes; and he praised every thing as most admirable. He wished to understand the difference of the canons in the description of the first and second order;—whether they were to be perpetual or not. And he thought it was better they should not be so, because if the students did not have a perpetual stipend they would be compelled to study to gain a livelihood. He said the same of the dean and the subdean, and thought it would be better that they should be elected by the students, with a view to emulation. He wanted to know also the difference between public and private professors. Moreover, as to the lectures, his Holiness does not see, "quod in scientia sophistria . . . de tempore legatur;" and although he feels sure that Wolsey will not omit Greek literature, there is no mention of it in the account, and he requests that there may be at least two Greek lectures in the college. 2420. KNIGHT to WOLSEY.

Was so vexed with sickness that he could not reach Winchester before Monday. Sent his chaplain to lord Sandys with the packet of letters received from Wolsey at Guildford, advertising him of the coming of the ambassadors. On the said Monday the King rode a-hunting. The King delivered him his signet, with many good words. After his first mass, went to him within his traverse, stating that I had information from you for him since your compendious news of the 23rd, 24th, and 25th ult., if he desired further information. He said he marvelled at the variableness of the Pope, and their desire that he should enter the league, contrary to their former opinion that he should first make certain capitulations for his indemnity. On my saying that it were desirable that his progress should be nearer to your Grace, he replied he did not see great cause why he should alter his progress, for he intended to see my lady Princess, and shortly after to approach within 30 miles of you. I mentioned that you wished that Sampson, Wolman, and I should be condjutors of such deaneries as Pace holds. The King did gladly accept your honorable and fatherly intention in that purpose. He says that Sir Thomas More has the copy of Luther's letter. I remain here till I have recovered. Winchester, Tuesday, 21 Aug.

Has heard from Peter Vannes that on a late occasion, when Vannes had spoken to Wolsey, expressing the writer's anxiety about public affairs, "ac simul ostendisset periclitaretur fore ut mea apud S.D.N. gratia et qualiscunque est auctoritas retur," that Wolsey had replied he had nothing to fear so long as he was under his own and the King's protection, and had sent him a present (deinde mu[nus ?] addidisse). Wolsey had further stated that the King had never failed to assist the Pope, nor would he at this time. Can make no return for their kindness. Has received his letters and the reciprocal [obli]gation, which he returns ratified to be presented to the Cardinal. He must obtain that of the king of England. The power is returned, altered, though there was no need for it.

Sends also the ratification for the dowry (dou . . .) of queen Mary. Will satisfy the King in that as in all other things. Has written what he is doing for the League. Has spent 20,000 cr. more than the obligation, which is for 40,000, with a third of the payment of the 14 . . . men with the marquis of Saluzzo, and four galleys more than the 12 he promised. To prevent Milan being attacked by sea from Spain, is content to prepare [a fleet]. Hopes the other confederates will act similarly. The Pope and Venetians marvel at Saluzzo's slow passage, but he has lost no time. It would have been better if the Pope had agreed with the duke of Ferrara, and made him [captain] general of the League. The D[uke] has sent to the Pope to ask for that charge, and for the restitution of a castle [of the] Florentines, which he formerly had. He must ask the King and Wolsey to urge the ambassadors of the Pope and Venice. Tells him that the aid and favor of the King [was] of little importance in Italy, but now he is more esteemed than any other prince in the world. He must himself judge how to act.

Wishes for continual news. Amboise, xx . . Aug.

Advises that, besides the ordinary remedies, letters missive from the King should be sent to the earl of Oxford, or the justices proceeded against for not executing the writs; and then the said certificate, with information of what has been done, sent to them, that they may inform the King, and ask his further pleasure.

2428. SANDYS to WOLSEY.

Received Wolsey's letter on Sunday, 19th Aug. Dr. Knight, who was to have presented the ambassadors and Wolsey's letters to the King, fell sick at Alton, and only got to Winchester on Monday morning, so that Sandys presented the packet in place of him. Last Sunday the ambassadors came before the King, who entertained them well, and gave them answer as mentioned in the King's own letter written by the dean of the Chapel. Bega that Wolsey will secure payment to him, by the last day of August, of the sums due to him by certain merchant strangers, by virtue of the recognizances, which were forfeited, and afterwards renewed by Wolsey's command. Has been kept a year and a half waiting for the money, which is over 100*l*. Desires a scire-facias against Melchior Libblere, of the Steelyard, who is not released of his first recognizance. Thinks, considering their offence against the King in suing him in another Prince's dominion, and also as they have kept Sandys so long waiting, that they should deliver the money 2431. RANDULPH BRERETON, of Chester, to WM. BRERETON, groom of the King's Privy Chamber.

R. O.

On the 23 Aug. received his letter by Robert Innesagh; and has accordingly written to master Doctor Hulman,† inclosing copies of the offices granted to Brounwynde and William Troutebek, which are both good and proven, and the fees that belong to the office of parker, viz., 1d. a day, eight acres of land, and windfallen wood. Has also stated that all other parkers have had the like. Sends the letter enclosed, unsealed, that he may read it, and amend it if necessary. Has also stated "the greatest value that the agistament of the park hath been answered of," enclosing copies of the accounts subscribed with his hand, that he may perceive the truth of it. No patent has been granted to parkers, containing the herbage. Advises him to get his warrant signed in all haste, as Sir Rauff Eggerton rode on Friday last to my lady Princess, "and so will come up with her, and intendeth to make great labour for all his offices and farms to him and his son jointly, if it cost him 1,000*l.*, as it is me told. Howbeit he speaketh fair, and every day more gently than other, I trust him the worse, and therefore prepare the best ye can for remedy as well with the King's grace as my lord Cardinal." Advises him to move the lady Princess, my lord of Exeter, and other of her council, to be good to him in the offices and farms the King has given him, and to cause master Knevett, and others that have offices of Eggerton's given them, to do the same.

Would like to know his pleasure concerning warrants that come down from the King and my lady Princess's council to be served in Shotwike park. One has lately come from her for a buck for master Russell, her secretary. Wishes to know whether it shall be served, and what answer is to be made to others who bring any. It were well for master Russell to have his, because he is secretary. Perceives that the lady Princess has, by the King's placard, authority to kill or give deer at her pleasure in any forest or park within the room that is appointed to her; and so, if her warrants are not served, displeasure will ensue. Wishes to know if the present parker is to continue. No one will stay long in the place, unless there are other profits than 1d. a day. "Master Eggerton speaketh fair now, and saith he is glad that ye have it." The sooner he moves him for the occupation of the eight acres and the house, with the profits belonging to the office, the better the King and Council will consider that 1*d.* a day is too little to live upon. He had better show the copies of the patents made to Brounwynde and other parkers to his learned counsel before Master Eggerton's coming, and take their advice, and find out whether the eight acres and windfallen wood are his, by reason of the parkership; if he has the grants in as large a manner as Brounwynde and others before him. The sooner he "is at a point" for the occupation of the land the better, as it is sown with corn, and the third sheaf belongs to him or his deputy as parker.

Asks him to forward the letter to Hulman when he has read it. Is surprised that his last letter was so long coming. Asks him to remember his matter concerning Robert Johns, and be good master to him therein. Hugh Salisbury has distrained the tenants for their rent. Has done the same, trusting that Robt. Johns will keep the last promise he made at Greenwich. Wishes to know his pleasure in the same. Would not be put to rebuke in the matter, if it be in his power to remedy it, for 100 marks. He can send word about what is to be done if any warrants are served in Shotwyke Park, and about Robt. Johns, by the bearer. Has given him 8*s.* for his costs, and has hired him a horse, as he could find no other messenger. Chester, 25 Aug.

Has received from him, enclosed in Dr. Stephen's letters, certain letters for the King to sign, concerning the summoning of the bp. of Armagh and the earl of Ormond's matters. Has given them to the King, who thinks the Bishop should not be called now, as Kildare the deputy and others are coming over, and he fears that the absence of so many might cause disorder. He wishes Wolsey to write to him to send secretly the demeanors of both the lords. He has therefore not signed the letter.

Has obtained the King's signature to the letter for the earl of Ormond, concerning the prize wines of Ireland, and that to the mayor of Waterford about a gun called a "batry a brasse," and he has given them to Jas. Butler son of the Earl. Rammesbury, 27 Aug. Signed.

View of the castle at Sheriff Hutton taken by Tho. Magnus, Sir Geo. Lawson and John Uvedale.

The lead on the roof is so worn that three of the old webs will scarcely make one; at least 16 fowder will be required to repair it. It is thought the timber is sufficient if any faults are found. There is enough to repair them. The corbels, water tables, stone spouts, and other necessities of masonry, especially the crests and loops, must be newly set up and mended with lime and sand. Most of the chimneys and draughts require mending, for they are very noisome when occupied. There are three wards; the inner one contains the hall, kitchen, lodgings for the lord, chapel, se . . r, buttery, pantry, and offices. The walls and towers are strong and high, but must be mended with lime and sand. Great part of the mantelwall of the middle ward toward the park is broken down, 21 yds. long, 6 yds. high, and 7 qrs. in breadth. The north wall also requires mending for 14 yds. in length, and to be increased $2\frac{1}{2}$ yds. in height. Another part is also defective 36 yds. long by 6 qrs. high. There is a well of fair water in the inner ward, and ponds for baking and brewing, near the walls outside. The bakehouse, very good, is within the inner ward. The brewhouse and horse mills, both good, are in the outer ward or base court, with stables, barns, garners, and offices. The base court is all open, the walls decayed, and the gates gone. The gate of the inner ward is worn, and needs three tons of iron to mend it. Of ordnance there is 6 brass falcons with their carts, 10 score iron shots, 6 barrels of powder, a barrel of bowstrings, 6 coffins of bows and arrows, 21 hagbushes, 2 bullet moulds. Signed by Magnus and Uvedale.

Complains of the chalk floors, and the rushes, which are so carelessly renewed that the bottom layer remains sometimes twenty years, harboring all sorts of nastiness of men and dogs and offal. Thinks also that the cause is to be found in the abundance of salt water, marsh grounds and the like, and the salt diet of the people. Thirty years ago, if I had entered a chamber which had not been inhabited for some months, I caught a fever. Wishes the streets were kept more clean from mud and other abominations. 2445. WOLSEY to MORE.

Is glad that his proceedings with the ambassadors, in putting off the King's entry into the league, have satisfied the King. Is now in no small perplexity, as commissions have come from the Pope and Venice, and the French ambassador expects the same; and if Wolsey refuses to entertain them, these parties may join the Emperor. Wishes to know the King's pleasure. Thinks he can so order matters for assurance of the King's pension that no conclusion shall be taken this year. Believes that this would be the best course. Is surprised that the King refuses to lend the Peter Pungarnet to the French ambassador, considering his deserts, and the manifest advantage of so doing. Insists upon the greater customs which will arise from it. The ambassador offers to new-rig her, besides paying 500 marks. Sends the King by lord Exeter crowns of the Rose, fresh-minted, which he hopes will please, and are current at 4s. 6d. the crown. Is not of the King's opinion that his answer to Luther's letter should be set forth at once, without waiting for a copy of the latter. Luther is full of subtlety, and the King's answer without the copy will be obscure.

Draft, in Wriothesley's hand, corrected by Wolsey.

2446. HENRY VIII. to LUTHER.*

Has at length received his letter, dated Sept. 1, 1525, expressing his sorrow for writing a foolish and hasty book against him at the instigation of his enemies, who represented that the King's book was not written by the King, and for his abuse of Wolsey. Asserts that he is the author of his book, and defends it. Wolsey is too prudent to be moved by Luther's abuse. He will be dearer to the King, the more he is hated by Luther and those like him. Luther calls him the plague of England; but the country owes many benefits to him, not the least being his opposition to heresy. England is well rid of apostate friars, who, deserting his kingdom and Christ's faith, are wallowing in lust with Luther. Inveighs against his marriage with a nun. Argues against Luther's doctrines concerning salvation by faith, and free will.

Would not have answered his letter, if Luther had not asserted that the King favored him. Luther says that he merely wants to be heard, and complains of being condemned before conviction; but the King asks whether he was not heard before the cardinal of St. Sixtus, when legate in Germany; whether he has not been heard publicly disputing in Saxony; and everywhere else by his books. Doubts not that he has been rightly condemned, as Luther himself condemns the Pope and the College of Cardinals. Reminds him that his opinions were condemned by the University of Paris, and others, and by the Emperor at the Diet of Worms; but that he refused to submit to their judgment, and appealed to the next General Council, assembled in the Holy Spirit; thus leaving a loophole for escape, if condemned by any future Council. Defends the Pope and the Papal Court from his aspersions. Refuses his offer to write a book in the King's praise. Advises him to give up his wife, bewail his errors, and the fate of those whom his doctrine has destroyed; and either publicly to preach the truth, condemning his former errors, or else to retire to a convent.

2449. SIR CHRISTOPHER DACRE to WILLIAM LORD DACRE.

Wrote to Angus on receipt of his letters, appointing a meeting on the East March on St. Bartholomew's even. Met lord Home that day at Janehalghe, when six bills were given in by either party, and three of them filed on either side, the rest being put in suspense for lack of followers. On Saturday the 25th met David Kerr at Ridanburn for the east end of Tevidale and part of Glendale; where likewise six bills were given in, and three filed on either side. The writer's brother Philip appointed a meeting at Ridingburne for redress on Wednesday the 5th inst.; the lord Home at Coldstream on the 6th; and like meetings by our deputies at those places on Thursday 27 Sept. and Monday 1 Oct. We viewwardens are also to meet in person on the 14 Oct. to complete redress, as Sir Chr. wrote to Magnus from Morpeth.

Angus has not agreed with the Queen or Lennox. They are gathering adherents on either side. The Queen, Lennox, and St. Andrew's intend to take the King from Angus, whose party is diminishing. Lennox came early one morning to the Borowmore without Edinburgh with 200 men, and sent a party of eight with geldings to help the King to escape by collusion with Master Kylmawres the treasurer, who led James through the coining house to Holyrood; but the Earl hearing of it, brought him to the

R. O.2450. The DUKE OF RICHMOND'S COUNCIL.

Sheriffhutton, 2 Sept. 18 Hen.VIII. Instructions given to Dr. Taite, almoner to Henry duke of Richmond and Somerset, by the said Duke's council, to be shown to Wolsey on his repairing to London.

1. To show him a copy of the letter written by the King to the said Council for granting Thos. Spert a patent under the Duke's great seal of the office of ballasting of ships in the Thames; also the indenture made between the duke of Norfolk and the said Thomas for that office, for which Spert gave 10*l.* a year; and to request that he may pay no less to my lord of Richmond. To show him the indenture, sealed by my lord of Richmond, to the like effect, and the newly devised patent,—either of which the King may accept; and if the former be accepted, to confer with Spert about the 10*l.* already due. If Spert do not think it worth while, other of the King's servants would take it at that rate. 2. That Sir Wm. Lisle and his eldest son Humphrey are prisoners in Pomfret Castle, to which they were committed on the deposition of certain witnesses at York, examined by Sir Wm. Ellercar; of which he is to show Wolsey a copy. The son misused himself in setting John Dobson in the stocks at Feltham, when he brought a citation from my lord Legate's commissary to be served on Wm. Fletcher at Feltham. Sir William is indicted at the last assize holden at Newcastle for riot and forcible entry, since he and his son were bound by recognizance for their good behavior. 3. Master Franklin, chancellor of Durham, has delivered to them the sums of money and plate with which he was charged. 4. The Council have received certain commissioners of sewers and for reformation of annoyances in rivers, returnable at Easter next. Considering the costs that the country has been at in making walls and ditches under the late commission, and owing to the outrageous rains and stormy weather that have lasted nearly six weeks past, things are worse than before in many places, while little or nothing effectual can be done, by reason of the approach of winter, till Easter next. Advise that new commissions may be sent to persons named in a schedule, with a longer day of return, and that fewer persons be required to be present at every sitting, as the ridings are large and thinly inhabited. 5. To show Wolsey the letter sent to them by the Earl of Westmoreland for payment of his fees at Berwick, and in the office of Vice-warden. The former is paid, or will be soon. Have perused an article in the instructions sent by Magnus, that the King will see my Lord discharged of the said fee for this year, ending at Michaelmas. 6. Request, in consideration of the great charges sustained by the Duke, that he be discharged of the 500*l.* borrowed of the abbot of St. Mary's. Not 400*l.* has yet been received from the Duke's lands this year, and the rest cannot be levied till Christmas or Candlemas. Signed: Brian Higdon—T. Magnus—W. Acknowledges the King's cordial representations. Has no doubt of his anxiety for the peace of Christendom, to which the Emperor is no less disposed. Thanks him for his offers touching Italy and the French king, and his anxiety to promote accommodation. That Henry may understand that he is not well-informed upon these affairs, and that the way proposed will not lead to peace, will send his ambassadors the whole correspondence with France, and other papers connected with Italy. Defends his conduct with reference to the League. Is willing to make any reasonable arrangement with France at the King's exhortation, and likewise for the payment of the King's debts. As to the Imperial Crown, the Emperor is not ambitious, and would not trouble Christendom for that purpose, but he will not accept it in any other way than his predecessors have done. If it were not for the hope of doing some good to Christendom against the Turks, Infidels, and Lutherans, his Majesty would not undertake a voyage to Italy merely for his coronation. As the Emperor is doing all he can to promote the peace there is no cause for the King's protestation that he despairs of doing any good, and that the Emperor has but little regard for their ancient friendship. Is satisfied with the King's protest that he has not joined the League. The King will see by the Emperor's answer to the Pope that the Emperor is willing to lay down his arms if his Holiness and the League will do the same. 2456. LEE to [WOLSEY].

The slow dispatch of young Mr. Guildford disappointed me of two letters I had proposed to send by him, advertising you in one of the taking of Milan, in the other of the delivery of the castle to Bourbon. There is no other conveyance at present, as the passage is stopped between Spain and Gascony. Is anxious to hear from England, for since the coming of Hichingham (Etchingham) on the 18 Aug. important rumors have sprung up. It was said the King had entered the league, and had paid monthly 25,000 ducats to continue the war. This court was much troubled at it, but now is rejoiced to find it untrue. The Emperor heard Lee's contradiction gladly; and on his saying that rumors must not be too easily credited, said, "I well see it now, and marvel not a little that the Frenchmen would publish the league, my uncle's name comprised therein." Urged him to have confidence in England and in your Grace, who was always ready to serve him. He answered, "Now is good time for my lord Cardinal to show it; I have confidence in him as in my father." Did this without any commission, "for here are many barkers against your Grace, which would persuade to the Emperor that all things whereof they have had rumor hath been the working of your Grace."

What De Praet has done or does secretly I cannot tell. He speaks well of your Grace, and has told the Emperor that your goodwill is important. He speaks to me in your and the King's commendations. He is now privy councillor. Will see in his letter to the King what business I and others have had with the French ambassador. The Emperor's answer to the King's demands I put in a paper by itself. Was much encumbered at the utterance of my commission, for it was everywhere reported "that the French king was dead; insomuch that the common voice ran, Ah, now the French king is in our hands again!" Reports news of the Pope, the Venetian army, and proceedings of Bourbon, Sessa, and Moncada in Italy. In Rome is great "huddre muddre." Many take part with the Emperor. The French are now making preparations.

News came on the 28 Aug. that the Hungarians had defeated the Turks. The villains of Germany have been overthrown, and 6,000 slain; "the residue fled to Venice, and there received into wages lest they should do more hurt; for they would have had passage to Rome." An army is ready to go with the Viceroy to Naples.

The Emperor is sending various papers by his ambassadors. The great book sent to the King, and the Emperor's absence, have caused Hichingham's delay. Granada, 4 Sept.

2463. BATTLE OF MOHATZ.

Copy of the letter of the Nuncio in Hungary, Possonia, 5 Sept.

On Wednesday, the 29th ult., the King fought the Turk, and was beaten with great loss. It was said that he fought most bravely, but it was not known what had become of him for three days. At last his chief chamberlain came, who said that the King was drowned in crossing an arm of the Danube in company with him and Stephen Azil, a nobleman, a friend of the Nuncio, who was at Rome at the time of the jubilee, and who, trying to aid the King, was also drowned. Many people say they saw the King cross the river, but more credence is given to the Chamberlain, especially as there is no news of the King or of the bishop of Gran, the chancellor, and many others. The infantry are killed to a man. A few heavy and light cavalry remain. Almost all the nobility are killed. Cannot give an accurate account of the battle, for no one can tell him. As far as he can discover it was thus:—The Hungarians commenced to march against the enemy at daybreak, and were attacked by them till the 22nd hour, 4 o'clock p.m., when, pursuing 10,000 horse who purposely fled, they were drawn into a wood and there attacked by artillery. The Turk has since taken and burnt Managh and Fünfkirchen, killing all the women and children. It is likely that they will come to Buda.

Received news of the disaster on the 30th, and in the middle of the night set out with the Queen from Buda for Possonia. Today asked her leave to go to his correspondent, but she wished him to stay a few days. It is said the Vayvode is at Buda with a good army, and intends to resist. Does not know what he can do. Some say he has intelligence with the Turk; but this is unlikely, as his brother was killed in the battle. It is true that he was not there in time to join. The remainder of the army is without a leader. Bohemia expects help from Ferdinand, whose wife has been sworn princess of Bohemia, but the dissension in his country will probably prevent him.

On this marched into Hungary with Mustapha Bassa, Ayas Bassa, the Beglerbeg of Natolia and Bechran Bassa. Made a bridge across the Drave, and broke it when they had crossed. The King marched from Buda to a plain called Mucha, with 150,000 foot and horse, and 300 guns, and stayed there five or six days. On Wednesday, Sept. 1,* at the 22nd hour, advanced against him, and in two hours defeated him, and slaughtered all his army, "sit semper laudatus Deus et mea maxima majestas." Is going towards Buda, and sends the bearer, Nali Spachi Oglan, to communicate the good news to Venice, as he is on terms of friendship with that city.

R. O.

Letter from the Nuncio with the most Christian king, 6 Sept.

The agents are anxious to send the payment for the third month, as that for the second had been already sent, and so 20,000 gold pieces were added for the expedition against Naples. A new fleet of large ships is being prepared in Brittany to help us in the Mediterranean Sea. Francis has sent 9,000 gold pieces for the same purpose. He thinks of invading Sicily or Naples. There is no news from Spain, but that the Viceroy was asking for his fleet. Nothing has been heard of the Legate since he left the Court on the 16 July. Fears he is detained. The marquis of Saluzzo was at Carmaniola. Almost all the French horse had crossed the Alps. The Marquis had sent Don Federico de Bozulo to Valentia, a town on the Po, six miles from Alexandria, on the road to Pavia, where he had 4,000 foot.

The French fleet appeared at Genoa on the 17th, and was obliged to return. It had intended to go to the eastern shore to meet that of the Pope and Venice.

ii. Letter of the Pope's lieutenant-general to the Nuncio in France, from the camp, 17 Aug.

Cremona with infantry and guns. Hopes to take it shortly. Two days ago about 50 brachia of the wall fell of its own accord, between the gate of St. Luke and the Castle; and Malatesta Baglione made an assault there, to the great loss of the enemy, who were shot at also by those in the castle. There being many ditches our men could not enter, and D. Julio Manfroni, Capt. Maconi and about 100 others, were slain. Now the proveditor is there, hopes they will succeed. They show no signs of sending help from Milan, which would be difficult; and, besides, as the papal army is at the walls, they dare not diminish their army. Has seen the letters of the Nuncio and Sanga. Must use great haste, for it is the second month of the Swiss, and they can get nothing from his Majesty for the second payment. It is impossible for the Pope to provide more. The marquis of Saluzzo came to Ravello on the 8th. The cavalry are not yet in Italy. Sent, in the name of the Pope and Signory, an order to raise 4,000 foot. Does not know when they will be ready. Cannot maintain everything without speedy help. Yesterday came Capino, who left at Bergamo all the Swiss, except 900 of Lucerne. They will be not less than 13,000. He will see that he wants money to pay them.

ii. Copy of letters from Antwerp, 26 Aug. "Bartholomæi [Berzeri] Alemani et sociorum."

Hears by letters from Buda of the 7th, and Venice of the 12th, that the Turk had stormed Peter Waradin and three or four other strong places, killing the women and children, and then marched towards Buda. The King had pitched his camp, but for want of money had only 7,000 or 8,000 men. He was about nine miles from the Turks, and it is thought will retreat towards Buda, which will fall into the invaders' hands within a short time, unless further help is sent. The Turk will then be able to spread his power over all Christendom. There is no time for delay. Everyone ought to help. Small and speedy assistance will be better than to delay by making great plans. If the Hungarians had money, they would not want men, and the Turks would not have come so far without resistance. The diet of Spires, although the princes have disagreed, have determined to send 12,000 foot paid for three months. Hears that an ambassador with money is coming from England. Letters from Lisbon state that the King is sending an ambassador to Hungary, who will come this way, and arrange with his agent for the payment of 4,000 foot while the war lasts. He has not arrived, and it is feared he is detained somewhere. These arrangements are very good if they are speedily carried out. He who is first will be able to say that not only Hungary, but great part of Christendom, has been saved by him.

2468. PIERS EARL OF ORMOND to WOLSEY.

Some of Ormond's servants have contended with some of the inhabitants of Bristol without his knowledge. Intended to have punished them, or given them up to the officers, but his lodging was attacked in the night by about 600 men, who threatened to burn him in his bed. Carlisle herald with difficulty got the mayor to interfere, to whose demands Ormond acceded, and gave up some of his servants. On sureties being demanded for them, Ormond requested that the affair might be brought before Wolsey and the council; but this was declined, and he was obliged to find sureties. Thinks the fault was on the side of the town, and fears they will not have an impartial trial. Shirehampton, 7 Sept. Signed and sealed.

2470. LEE to [HENRY VIII.]

After his letter of the 19 July wrote again on the 4 Aug. of the news of Milan and Hungary, and again on the 11th of the taking of Milan by Bourbon, mentioning that the duke of Milan had a pension from the Emperor of 30,000 ducats, and the revenues of Como, until it be tried whether he be worthy to lose the dukedom or not. Trusted to have sent them by young Mr. Guildford. Since then there has been no great news out of Italy. On Assumption day last was sent for by the French ambassador, who pretended to be sick, stating he had letters to communicate to me. Showed me letters from his master, and an article of the league of Italy, that the Emperor be requested to liberate the Dauphin and his brother. He wished me to be joined with the Pope's ambassador in that request, which I declined without express commission. When asked my advice by the Nuncio I advised delay, as ambassadors were daily expected from England. Did not at first know, until he had examined divers letters, that the King had not entered the league, as it was reported.

Saturday the 18th, Hichingham arrived with instructions, when I desired the Nuncio and others to meet at my house, and showed them your letters, which they marvellously liked. It was arranged that I should go alone to the Emperor. On Sunday visited the Chancellor, desiring an interview with the Emperor, which he promised should be soon, and an audience with him on Monday alone. On communicating my instructions he listened attentively, desiring me to repeat what he did not understand. When I had made an end he repented all things in good order and with good remembrance in French, answering every article in French, "which partly I did perceive, but in part I did not." He expressed his obligation to the King, and said if there were any default in the wars of Italy, it should not be in him. If he made more special answer I did not understand him. He seemed to say that he was willing to come to parole touching the French king's children, but he does not much trust the French king. He was anxious to content your Grace as to the debts. I requested speedy answer. He replied that his physicians counselled him to ride abroad two or three days for his health, and when he had returned he would answer with all diligence. I then told him that as his Majesty had more pleasure in French than in Latin, and I could not so well express in Latin all things contained in my commission, I had caused it to be translated into French; which he received gladly.

Visited the Chancellor on Wednesday, who told him that a paper had been read several times in the Council, that the Emperor would send a satisfactory answer, and revoke his armies from Italy. They are much offended with a papal brief, and declare they are not the cause of the war. The duke of Alva said the Pope should have written "such a letter as the noble king of England hath done." They called the brief "a crimination, no excusation." Lee had advised that it should not be delivered. The Chancellor promised that at the Emperor's coming home they would declare to him in council their minds upon it, which he trusted would be to the contentation of your Highness.

The Emperor returned late on Saturday. Visited him on Sunday. He assured me that his Council on that afternoon should devise an answer to the King. Called for an answer. Was told they had been too much occupied, and he should have it tomorrow. Told the Emperor on the morrow "that your Highness would think every hour one day" till he heard from him. He assured me I should be answered in three or four days.

The French ambassador has solicited the Nuncio and the Venetian orator to join with him in proposing an article for redemption of the children, vowing, if the Emperor would not deliver them for money, "he would give summonawnee to him." At the request of the others, I visited the French ambassador on Saturday, and drew from him his purpose. He said he would go to the Emperor at Sauncte Fees, where he was hunting. I told him that as the Emperor was without his Council, he would get no answer, and so dissuaded him from his purpose until I got my answer. He might then follow his own direction if he were not satisfied, but he must use no threats. On his asking, how then could he obey his commission, I replied that some things must be left to the discretion of the commissioners. He consented. After much importunity he induced the Nuncio and the Venetian ambassador to join with him in a visit to the Emperor; at which he used expressions with which the Emperor "was more provoked and kindled than ever afore." He said, on asking for the deliverance of the children, This is my master's desire and "summation;" which the Emperor took for "summonawnee." The Nuncio requested the Emperor to enter the league for the peace of Italy and Christendom. The Emperor professed his anxiety for the same,—that he had entered the war with reluctance,—that he marvelled at the Pope's brief, which was full of contumely and reproach,—that he had ever been obedient to the Church, and so it should be found. He refused to enter the league, as there were many things in it against him; and then he turned to the ambassador of France, saying, "I will not deliver them for money. I refused money for the father: I will much less take money for his sons. I am content to render them upon reasonable treaty, but not for money, no I will trust any more the French king's promise, for he hath deceived me, and that like no noble prince. And where he excuseth that he cannot fulfil some things without grudge of his subjects, let him fulfil that that is in his power, which he promised by the honor of a prince to fulfil ; that is to say, that if he could not bring all his promise to pass he would return again hither into prison. And so, Monsieur Orator, write you to him that I claim of him his royal promise to return into prison, and he shall have his sons delivered. For in that that he will have them by violent means, I will rather attempt all that I may, whatsoever come of it, and that although I should endanger my person with all that I have. And would God that he were content, in the avoiding of Christian blood, to try the right with me, hand for hand, I would, upon confidence of my right, take it on me, which I trust in the righteousness of God should defend me. And now, turning him to the Nuncio, see, saith he, what a prince this is ! He promised me to put the Pope down, and to bring him to be no better than a chaplain, and that he would make me lord of all Italy. I told him that I desired none of both, but rather good amity to continue between the Pope and me, and the peace of Italy, my right saved ; desiring [him] to show himself like a prince of good faith in keeping the other articles promised on his behalf, or else that he would not take my sister to marriage. Whereunto he answered, Thereunto I promise to God and you my faith ; and likewise did I unto him. The conclusion of this communication was that if he would have good peace with the Emperor, the Emperor was content to keep peace with him, and to deliver his sons to him upon treaty and good surety, but not for money."

At the same interview the Viceroy, who was present, said that the French king had promised to him to perform his promise to the Emperor, and if any Frenchman said the contrary, he was willing to try it with him. He also affirmed that Francis had offered for the redemption of the pledges 3,000,000 cr., and to renounce all claims in Italy. These things I report by the mouth of others. I understand that the Emperor, being dissatisfied with himself for being in such heat, sent for the ambassadors, and proposed their demands to his Council in his absence ; at which the French orator, as if the league were made only for redemption of the children, said with open mouth, "I ask no peace. I demand only the King my master's sons ; and if you will not deliver them, I have another chapter in my commission to say unto you." He was urged to be more moderate, and if he would "entend" to the general peace of Christendom, he should have answer in what manner the Emperor would deliver them. He said he had no such commission ;—notwithstanding that the bill sent to him insisted on the peace of Italy, and the inclusion of the King's debts in the league.

He has done much to trouble the King's purpose. The Chancellor showed him, by the date of his letters, and the former offers of the French king of 2,000,000 ducats for his children, that he had been answered already. They sent for the French ambassador again on Thursday, showing him the Emperor was willing, upon commission sent, to treat for the redemption of the children. All three had a meeting with Lee on Friday, when the French ambassador told him what had taken place at the Council,—how "he marvelled he was called alone, and that was answered to him that they were already at point with the other two ;"—that he thought this answer suspicious. He was accordingly handled on all sides, but in the end he was persuaded to write for a commission to the French king. Was with the Chancellor on Thursday, who told him the answer "was already drawn out ;" that the Emperor had not seen it, but he would see it in the afternoon. On Friday nothing was done ; for that day, by ancient order, is kept for consultations.

Went on Saturday to the court ; saw the Emperor, and asked for his despatch. He answered, that every day he had done something in it, and that the delay arose from his desire to satisfy the King. On Saturday the Chancellor told me I should have an answer from John Almain on Sunday. On Sunday it was not ready. On Monday the Chancellor sent word "that only for to make up the answer he went that day to the Emperor." As he came home late that day, was with him at 7 next morning, when it was read to me in the presence of the Emperor's confessor and De Præet, with a request that I would enclose it in my packet, and that the King's servants should wait until the letter and the instructions were ready. The Emperor is sending to England copies of all his correspondence with the French king. Sends the Emperor's answer in French. "I am much deceived but that he will do all his endeavour to content your Highness." Touching the delivery of the Dauphin and his brother,* "albeit the Emperor hath made general answer only, which in like general terms he uttered to the ambassador of France, yet I know that he said to one secretly that if the French king would entende to the peace universal of Christendom, he could be content not only to deliver him his sons gratis, but also to depart with him somewhat of his own; yet, in the answer to the King's grace's debts, he maketh insinuation of money."

The King has reason to thank God that the means have been put into his hands for staying the disorders of Christendom. All are inclined to peace; and the archbishop of Capua has written to say, on the part of the Pope, that if he had not been tied in the league he would have accepted the conditions of peace brought by Moncada from the Emperor. Has taken precautions that the King shall not be included in the proclamation of the league.

On asking the Emperor his intentions about the duke of Milan, he made me an answer in French, "which, because I would have more clear, I desired his Majesty that he would cause Mons. de Pratt, which only of his Council speaking Latin was then present in the chamber, to declare his Majesty's mind to me in Latin." He said the Duke was not utterly deprived, and, if found worthy, he should be restored; and for this he should have learned and indifferent judges. If unworthy, he would not keep the duchy for himself or for his brother, but bestow it on such a one as the Pope and Italy shall desire. He hoped the king of England would act rightly in this matter, and not take part with a guilty subject, but weigh the case in equal balance. By his expression "whom the Pope and Italy desire," he means the duke of Bourbon. He desires his commendations to the King, and trusts the amity between you will continue. He has declared to the Nuncio that though he made a sharp answer to the Pope's brief, he desires to have peace with him. The Italian ambassadors are anxious for the restoration of the duke of Milan, more for their own private ends, and half wishing the feud may continue between France and the Emperor. It is reported that Peter of Navarre has taken Saona. Andrea Dorea is on the look-out for his navy. Granada, 7 Sept.

When last with the Emperor, "to have the uttre dispatch of Mr. Hychingham," Lee, after he had showed his mind about the King, asked him if he would command him to write anything to Wolsey. He said, "I pray you in most cordial manner commend me to Mons. Cardinal, saying to him on my behalf that my trust is that, as I have hitherto reckoned him as my father, and have found him in many things accordingly, so he will continue; he shall so have me as his son and friend. in my head some suspicions, yet now I have all forgotten, and account no less of him than I have done in times past, trusting that he will now employ himself first to the common wealth of Christendom, as I perceive he doeth, and after to have me commended for my private affairs." Lee told him he was sure he would always find Wolsey devoted to him above all other princes, and he said he had charged his ambassadors to say somewhat to him.

Was visited by Bourbon's solicitor on the 7th, who excused himself that the visit was not made by his master's desire. He said he was the King's true servant, and as Wolsey took him for his son when he first entered the Emperor and the King's service, so he reputed you as his father. He said that in the event of the Duke being appointed to the duchy of Milan, he would not only pay Wolsey's pension upon it, but increase it. Told him I did not think I could make such a communication, except I had better proof than mere words, and therefore it would be better he should send some one to your Grace. I further said that the King and you were well affected to his master. Moved the Emperor the same day for an answer touching the Duchy, as your Grace will see by my letter to the King. Has never been noticed by him before, although he has been here six months. Cannot tell how long he will have to tarry for the Emperor's letters. 8 Sept.*

Has informed him, in his other long letters, of the Emperor's answer about the duke of Milan; but since then, seeing the slow despatch of the Emperor's letters, and the books he is going to send to his ambassador in England, enquired what the Emperor laid to the charge of the Duke. Hears, first, that at the taking of Francis the Duke attempted to prevent the Emperor from henceforth meddling with Milan; 2, that when he was sick, he demised the dukedom to his brother in France. His informant does not believe these charges. Thinks that Jerome Moron, being in danger of receiving his deserts when the Duke died, wrote to the elder brother in France, who has never been on good terms with the present Duke, and that when the Duke heard that he had been accused by Moron, who was thrown into prison by Pescara, he offered to purge himself and go in person to the Emperor. The Emperor received on the 7 Sept. a more gentle brief from the Pope. Notwithstanding his frequent going to the Emperor they show themselves very slow in writing their great book. Granada, 9 Sept.

2477. The DATARY GIBERTO to GAMBARA.

I perceive from your letter of 17 Aug. that you had shown my letter of 21 July [to the King and Wolsey?], in which I gave you notice of Sanga's mission thither (to England). Our labour in writing, and yours in negotiating, is all lost. Your letter of the 28th came with two others from Sanga, giving information as to what had been done with the Cardinal (Wolsey). The King (Henry) and the French king became great friends on the capture of the latter, from fear of the Emperor's aggrandisement; but now our ruin will ensue, and the Emperor will become supreme if he obtain the King's friendship. The Cardinal (Wolsey) knows how much he himself is indebted to the Pope. There were never in the world two princes of such virtue and excellence as the King and Cardinal, who could draw even the stones to love and serve them. Compliments to the Rev. M. Syl. (Darius?). Rome, 11 Sept. 1526.

2478. ——— to ———.

Does not know what to write, as Sanga's coming has been fruitless. It is wonderful that Henry should have so much feared the Emperor's power when Francis was taken prisoner, and immediately assisted the latter; but now that the Pope's ruin is imminent, and the Emperor is becoming master of everything, they allow him to be destroyed, although Wolsey owes so much to him. Has written several times, and is sorely grieved that their letters are not believed. Are in fearful extremity. Their fleet has arrived, but they cannot use it long, as galleys will not serve in the winter. Since nothing has been done at Genoa, and Cremona is occupied, we shall soon leave Cremona, and try Genoa again in vain. This was our game the whole year. Expects daily the Spanish fleet. Hears that the Archduke is coming to Italy himself. The duke of Ferrara is treating or going to treat with the Emperor. He has paid the cavalry of count Alex. Nuvolaria, whom he led into Carpi. He is collecting stores there, and allows travellers to be robbed, so that all commerce is stopped beyond Bologna. Rome, 11 Sept.

2479. GIBERTO to GAMBARA.

Whilst all the letters that come from you continue to be of the same tenor, you will not be surprised if I do not change my arguments. If the Cardinal (Wolsey) is not moved by our representations, our ruin will come to pass within a brief period. Your letters of the 22nd have arrived with those of Sanga, giving an account of his discussions with the Cardinal. We saw from the beginning that the Cardinal was immovable. The king of England and the cardinal of York will incur great obloquy if they desert the Apostolic See in this its hour of need.

The Spanish army will soon arrive in the kingdom (of Naples), and we cannot possibly make a successful resistance unless the French king makes an attack in his quarter, and unless the king of England does immediately what he talks of doing next year. Without succors we shall perish. The Cardinal ought not, therefore, to say or think that it is unnecessary to trouble about Italy, but to cherish it, and to esteem it above his own country; for all the good that is effected here will enable him to live there in greater quiet and dignity. I lament the crude state of mind shown by the Cardinal, who is unmoved by reasons so efficacious and evident, inconsistently with his usual penetration. I will not reply to that portion of Sanga's letter, where he writes that they (the English) insist on the pension, and on security for repayment of their contributions, because I cannot believe it to be true. I have sent your letter to Venice, in order to convince them you are not an Imperialist.

2481. CLERK [and TAYLER] to WOLSEY.

The King and my Lady, with a few attendants, went to hunt at a castle, four leagues hence, intending to return in three or four days, but delayed in consequence of sport and of my Lady's sickness. On Friday the 7th she returned. We had proposed to ride over to speak with them, but were advised not to do so. On the Sunday after visited the King, who "used many goodly and galiard words," telling us the affairs in Italy went well forwards. He said the day before he had received letters out of England from his ambassador, "and how that the king of [England, his] entire beloved brother and best friend, would have [him] now become and wax a good man. What he should [mean] thereby we cannot tell."* He proposes to send a shipful of wild swine as a present to the King, saying he knew there was no great plenty of them in England, "and that the hunting of them was very pleasant, [and] a king's game."

The Tuesday after were told by the Council that the Pope's, the Venetians' and the French fleets had joined, and taken all the towns on the river of Genoa, Genoa excepted; and that the marquis of Saluce had arrived at Aste. They reckon they have in the camp 33,000 foot and nearly 2,000 men-at-arms. The Emperor's expedition to Naples is refrigerate; the Archduke will lend no aid, as the Turks are in Hungary. The Pope and the Colonnas are agreed. The Council insisted on the various efforts made by Francis for the war in Italy beyond what he was bound. Clerk has not been able to carry out his own particular instructions, as Madame has been ill. All are sorry to hear that the Pope and the duke of Ferrara cannot agree. Considering the Duke's power, riches, and wisdom, he can do more harm than all the Emperor's army, as was seen in Pope Leo's day. The French king says he has sent to him the bishop of Bayonne, but without effect, as the Duke is high and unreasonable. Seeing the success of the Emperor's party, the Chancellor thinks the King should interpose in the matter. Consider it of no use, except so far as it "may serve you for a stop in talking with them of your entry into the league; out whereof we beseech Almighty God to keep the King's highness; for surely it will be a very dangerous and endless reckoning."

P.S.—News have come that the duke of Urbino has left the camp at Milan for Cremona. Sanga has arrived with your Grace's letters, and reports of his good entertainment. Have pondered Wolsey's reply to Sanga, and think it unanswerable. It is no use to talk of the taking and redelivery of Naples. This keeps the city in great perplexity; "for they see that they shall change, but th[ey] wot never to whom; and the Church they will not, the Venetians much less; for volunt Regem." Think that if a son of the last king, or one of the family, were sent to the borders of Naples, he might do miracles in producing a revolution. Amboise, 13 Sept. Signed.*

Sanga arrived here yesterday. Has had little communication with him, as he has been busy deciphering letters and waiting for an audience, which he will probably have of the King today, but not so soon of my Lady, who still keeps her chamber. Will confer with him afterwards, "as well concerning such matter[s] as] been contained in the one of your Grace's letters written [by] the secretary, as also concerning those matters that been in [the] letters written by your Grace's own hand; and in these l[etters] (according unto the trust your Grace of your goodness hath i[n] me), I shall so instruct Sanga before his departing that [no] doubt but your Grace shall have your intent in many of y[our] petitions. The bulls for your college are sped and sent you already. There will be great difficulty circa i[stud] benedictum divortium; reliqua omnia sunt clara et succedent a haud dubie." Touching Master Dean's† dispensation no mention is made de defectu either in the minute of the old brief or of the new. Supposes the first brief must have been sped ad partem super defectu natalium, "as indeed I am well [aware] that I obtained a sign[at]ur that there was ever any bull sped thereon, it may [please your] Grace to cause some search to be made among Master books; for if there were any it must needs come into [his] hands, albeit it shall make no great force," for Tayler will write to the Datary, and have provision made in the second new brief. to be dissolved by any one unless it be the archbishop of St. Andrew's. The abbots of Melrose and Dunfermline, "breder and nephews to the said Archbishop," are slain; also his great friend the lord of Kere (John Stirling), captain of Stirling, and many others of his kin. No one else in Scotland can cope with Angus and Arran, now that Lennox is slain, "and the other taken." The young King should be counselled to lean to the two Earls, as the men of most power in Scotland, notwithstanding any letters written by Wolsey against Angus. It is said Jas. and Will. Steward, brothers to lord Evendale, are both slain. They were special servants to the Queen, and brothers to Harry Stewarde, who attends her Grace. Writes thus to explain the letter sent him by Sir Chr. Dacre, and to show his opinion on the affairs of Scotland. Wrote to my lord of Cumberland in favor of Sir Christopher as Wolsey desired, but, as appears, without effect. Has some trouble in reducing the expenditure of this household within the income; but, after putting the commissions lately sent in execution as well as may be at this time of year, and sitting at York at Michaelmas for the ministration of justice, will visit all my lord of Richmond's lordships in these parts. Wrote last the . . . inst., in answer to his of Aug. 23. My lady received, three days ago, from the gov[ernor] of Kes, out of Burgundy, the original of the enclosed tidings. Last night was told by an Italian merchant, that a man who came from Lyons on the 8th inst. showed him that the common report was that Gennes was tor[ned] from the Emperor, and Milan strongly besieged. Thinks Tuke will hear the truth before he does. Mons. de Maras arrived on the 12th, and made his rep[ort] the same day. The Council has dispatched a post to the provost of Cassell.

Hearing that Wallop was coming hither, came over last night from the court. He arrived this afternoon, and they intend tomorrow, a[fter] mass, to go and deliver his letters to my Lady at Ba[row], where the court is now. Will return hither with him.

Tonight, after psalm time, spoke with the factor of the Folkys, who told him that, by letters from Duytchlande, they hear that the Turk has defeated the Hungarians, and that the King is dead. He was sure that if the King had had 150,000 ducats more he would have destroyed his enemies. The king of Portugal long ago sent a gentleman through France with credence for 50,000 ducats for Hungary, and the French king caused him to tarry, as he did the Emperor's ambassador. Asked the Portuguese factor how he meant to send the money. He answered that a German merchant offered to pay a Hungarian ducat at Vienna for every 48 placks or stuwyrs he received here, and would accept the angel noble for 11s. 3d. Fl. or 67½ st., and the French crown of the sun for 7s. Fl. or 42 st. Refers him to Wallop's letters. Antwerp, 14 Sept. 15[26].

Received about the same time three letters from him. Could not write, as he had no cipher with him, but has informed D. Troilus Negro of everything, and will write to him as often as possible.

Since leaving Rome has endeavored to assist the army of Lombardy, to preserve the Genoese and Siennese, to collect money, and to send off the galleys. Has also been acting on his instructions from the Emperor to offer Carpi and other places to the duke of Ferrara. Spinaro will tell him the Duke's answer. Fears that the Almaini and Spaniards will come too late to assist Milan, Sienna, and Cremona. Cardinal Colonna, the lords of the Colonnese, and the writer, have therefore determined to assist the Imperial party personally. An agreement has accordingly been made concerning the territory of the Colonnas with the Pope, that he may be attacked when unprepared. He has not now in Rome more than 200 foot and 100 horse. The rest he has sent to Sienna and other places, and 200 horse to Sora. Has urged the "dominos c[onsilia]rios Napolis" to send all their forces with [Ascanio] Colonna to the assistance of Sienna; which they have agreed to do. He is now at Sora, preparing his forces.

We intend really to attack Rome. Have 800 horse and 5,000 foot in all. Will send the galleys at Gaeta towards Ostia, under the command of Zymanrich, directly he starts for Rome. Will remain with Ascanio. All this will be done in six days. Desires him to inform the Emperor, the duke of Bourbon, the marquis of Guasto, and Ant. de Leyva. Has received no letters from the Emperor since leaving Spain, nor his correspondent's letters by Leonard. Prays for the safe arrival of the ship with his correspondent's letter, informing him that an ambassador has been sent to him. The Pope has written to the French king and the captains of the fleet of the League to stop the Emperor's fleet. Will send in six days a galley to tell the Viceroy the safest way. Will write fully to the Emperor thereby.

2487. EARL OF ANGUS to WOLSEY.

After the departure of Clarendshawis herald, the King was beset, on his return from the Middle Marches at Melrose, by Levenax and his accomplices, to the number of 3,000 men, who intended to take him, and kill Angus. Had no more than 300 men, but Levenax did not succeed. Soon after they met at Striveling by counsel of the archbishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, the bishops of Dumblane and Orkney, the earls of Levenax, Crawford, and Cassilis, lords Lyndesay, Ross, Sympill, Lyle, and Avandale, and others. On the 3rd they moved thence to Linlithgow, on their way to Edinburgh to take the King. Arane and Angus met them near Lithgow, and defeated them. After all these troubles during the King's minority, diligence shall be used that good rule may be kept for the future. Has written these news to the King. Edinburgh, 16 Sept. Signed.

Though the King and Wolsey will not believe their necessity, they do not wish it to be said that it was their fault for not informing them of it. Will be ruined unless they have present help.

History will say that in the time of Clement VII. the Holy See was ruined, and Italy devastated, to the dishonor of the King and Wolsey, for allowing their friends to be destroyed. The Pope would not be so importunate if he did not see ruin before him. If they do not help him they will be considered the most blind and the most cruel of all living men. The Nuncio in France will give them further information. The Spanish fleet, 50 ships with 9,000 foot, has gone away with the Viceroy. Four thousand Swiss should be taken away from the army in Lombardy, and new infantry raised, but he sees no chance of being successful either here or in Lombardy, unless the French king makes more efforts, and moves the war across the mountains, and unless the king of England does at once the chief part of the things Wolsey says he will do next year. Wrote last on the 15th by a post named Locquebaw. Went with Wallop, on the 16th, to the lady Margaret's court at Barrow. Supped with the lord [of] Barow, the lord of Bewyrs, and Mons. the Barre. After supper they conveyed us to my Lady. Wallop delivered the King's letter and his credence in a manner that pleased my Lady right well. Refers to Wallop's letters to Wolsey. My Lady has received no confirmation of the Hungarian news, but Hooghstraet told him that yesterday he heard from his cousin at Franc[ur]t that on the 29 Aug. the Turk had defeated the King, who escaped with only four men.

Wallop and he have spoken with the nassy . . . of Belserys about sending the money to Hungary. They will pay it at Vienna, or some other frontier town, taking 10 per cent.; but if the money were here, they could do it for 8 per cent. The Hoghstetters, who are as rich and puissant as the Belsers, will do it for less, but will undertake no more than 50,000 cr. Crowns are worth here 43 placks, and angellets 11s. 4d. Desires him to see his pensions of Palentine and Toledo paid according to the consignment made by the Pope's bulls upon the bishoprics. Is to consult with John Almayne, whom Wolsey has deputed one of his commissioners "jointly and severally with you," as appears by the commission sent herewith. If the pensions, amounting to 7,500 ducats, be duly paid, is content to give Almayne 500 ducats a year. Sends copy of the Emperor's grant of 9,000 ducats in recompense of the bishopric and abbey of St. Martin's in Tournay, which is now four years in arrear. 2496. HUNGARY.

"Nova Hungarica allata ex Pettovia die xx. Septembris."

The Turk entered Buda on the 9th, and killed everyone over 13 or 14 years of age. He kept no prisoners, but sent those under age to Turkey. He has burnt many towns. The King, after his defeat, was drowned in a marsh, whither his horse had carried him. Those lords of Hungary who have escaped are not making any attempt to recruit the army, but are committing worse cruelties than the Turks, spoiling and burning their own domains. The Turk is preparing to storm Vienna, and collecting a large fleet on the Danube. The prince of Austria has sent forces, and is doing what he can to fortify the city. He has got 30,000 foot and horse for the recovery of Hungary, which he claims as his own by the King's death. The waywode of Transylvania has 50,000 men-at-arms, but dares not leave his own country, for fear of the waywode of Wallachia, who, though a Hungarian, is half an Infidel. The Turk had in his army 300,000 men, and sent forward to the first engagement 70,000 men. In the van were 30,000 horse. The Turks began the attack, and met with a rather hot reception. When they came near the Turkish guns they divided into wings. For a whole hour the firing was furious, and the Hungarians were routed, with great slaughter of bishops, lords, and great men. After the victory, the Turks refreshed themselves three days, and then went about carrying rapine and slaughter to the confines of Germany.

i. 289.

Has read to the King Wolsey's letters to himself of Sept. 17. He is rejoiced at the success of Angus and Arran against their enemies, whose enterprises would imperil the young King, and cause disquiet to England. He approves of Wolsey's device, to entertain them with good letters and pleasures from the King, and with advice about the bringing up of the young King, that he and his realm may have cause to rejoice at the late victory against those who were assembled against him present in the field. They now have open proof that the archbishop of St. Andrew's uses all his power to procure their destruction, and to make war and revolution in the kingdom; and they should so repress their adversaries that they cannot hereafter deceive them by craft, or distress them by open rebellion. They must not believe the blandishments which the Archbishop will probably use for the purpose of revenging himself when there is occasion. Henry thanks Wolsey for these tidings, and for the letter devised in his name to the chancellor of Poile. He thinks it honorable neither to himself nor to the French king that the Emperor's ambassador is detained in France; he is not certain whether he is detained against his will, but thanks Wolsey for soliciting his enlargement. 200 lances. John de Medicis will not leave the camp, and not a soldier will be removed, and therefore, unless there is some obstacle on the side of France and the Venetians, the siege of Milan and Genoa may continue. Don Hugo excused himself for what he had done on the plea of necessity, because he understood that Genoa had been reduced to great straits by loss of the fleet which Andrea Doria had taken. Peter of Navarre writes that he has received a third part of the French contribution for arming the fleet. The kings of France and England must resolve whether the compact between Don Hugo and the Pope shall be observed or not. If not, things may come to a happy termination, as the 200 lances and the 2,000 foot which the Pope will have in Rome will prevent the Colonnese and Imperialists at Naples from joining Bourbon in Lombardy. I have told the Pope that he erred in trusting Colonna, and must not now put faith in Don Hugo, notwithstanding the treaty. When he finds that the Imperial fleet is near, he will break his engagement as did, therefore he must prepare for war. There is much fear of the Emperor himself coming to Italy when he finds that . . . is ready to lay siege to Rome.

The calamity he predicted has taken place. Hopes the Nuncio will now be able to persuade the Princes to give assistance. If the magnitude of the fact do not speak for itself, thinks eloquence will be useless. The King and Cardinal would certainly pity us if they saw the miserable position of the Pope, and of the Faith of which he is Defender. Not only the Pope who undertook the expedition and confederacy at Henry's persuasion, but any private person, even if an enemy, ought to have help in such extremity. The King would earn a double title of Defender of the Christian Faith, if he enabled the Pope to feed the little spark that remains, till it became a great fire, so that he could take vengeance on the wicked ones who have come into his inheritance.

2507. SIR CHRISTOPHER GARNEYS to WOLSEY.

On the 17th was presented to the King's council here. Gave Mr. Treasurer the King's letters for his admission into his room here, and was sworn of the Council; for all which he thanks Wolsey. Asks whether he is to hold the portership according to the old customs, having the pre-eminence of the Comptroller. The latter, Sir Robt. Wotton, has obtained, by means of his brother Mr. Belknap, a letter from the King to the Deputy and Council, that for his ancient service he should have the pre-eminence of Garneys, which was never seen, the porter being a knight. Sir John Wilshire sat above Sir Robt. Wotton, before the latter was a knight; but when his son-in-law, the lord Marquis, had obtained knighthood for him from the King, he had pre-eminence over Wilshire. Would give Mr. Comptroller the pre-eminence, if it would not prejudice his office.

When he was sworn in, Mr. Treasurer made him sit at his side. Mr. Comptroller then produced his letter, that the King had pardoned him as to keeping a horse, and that he was to have the pre-eminence over Garneys. Mr. Treasurer asked Garneys what he had to say to it. Begged him not to take away what the King had granted, which was that he should occupy the office in as ample a manner as Sir Ric. Carew or Sir Robt. Wotton. At this Mr. Comptroller began "to fawne." Hears that Wotton said that my lord Marquis, his brother Belknap, and all his friends, should fail him, but he would remove Garneys' cushion. Asks him to speak to the King about it. 2508. GHINUCCI to [WOLSEY].

Since his last letters of the 11th, there is every day better hope of recovering Cremona. It is thought that the marquis of Saluzzo, with French men-at-arms and infantry, has come to assist "the said Duke" in besieging the city. Wrote also on the 19th of the distressing news from Hungary. Letters have arrived at Venice that the Turk had defeated the King on Aug. 29, and that the King had not been found since. Letters from the Pope's nuncio confirm this, and say further that the Turkish army is 150,000 light horse and "xxx^m . . . [peditum,] 15,000 being arquebusiers; that the Hungarian army was only 30,000 light horse and 15,000 foot; that the Turk had 800 cannon, but not much larger than arquebuses. He deceived them by putting a few in an open place, and the rest concealed. The Hungarians, hearing that a Transilvanian force of 15,000 horse was coming to their assistance, and also the Emperor's brother with 2,000 horse and 6,000 foot, trusting too much in their own strength, wished to gain all the glory for themselves. In the battle, almost all the Hungarian foot deserted; they were partly Germans, partly Bohemians, partly Moravians. Of the cavalry 15,000 or 20,000 were killed, and about 20,000 or 25,000 Hungarians were killed after the victory. The Emperor's brother has gone with a small body of men to Vienna, which no one thinks can be defended if the Turks attack it, as it is not fortified, and there are not enough troops. It is thought, however, that they will postpone this till the spring.

Wrote, on the 20th, of the entry of the Imperialists and Colonnese under don Hugo into Rome. They have sacked the Pope's palace. Don Hugo visited the Pope, who gave as hostages his nephews Cardinal Cibo and De Ridulphis. He demanded the castle and others to be given up for the security of the Imperialists, but the Pope refused. On the following day, the 21st, an agreement was made, of which he encloses a copy. On the 22nd the Imperialists and Colonnese left Rome. The Pope is still in the castle; but as soon as a few soldiers have been collected to protect him, he will go to the Palace. "Il Papa sempre a litto (detto ?) che egli non osserverà nulla di questa tregua a Cesare come il Re di Francia et il Re d'Inghilterra pure deve far il debito, cioè che il Re di Francia vogli supplire a la negligentia sua con molto piu denari et gente come sarà necessario et che il Re d'Inghilterra entri a la contributione."

"Il Papa è desperato et renega la patientia oltra che noi continuamente la mostrato la sua infamia et vettuperio, egli la conosce, et dice deve piu presto morire che vivere con tal vettuperio che soi suditi et il Cardinale Colona la habino preso di questo modo e su questa tregua."

"Il Papa dice che ora e tempo che il Re d'Inghilterra et il Cardinale mostrino cio che molte volte li hano oferto; ora e tempo di defendere la fede con levarlo da questa meseria et ajutarlo ad vendicarse, et dice non deve mai perdonare a Colnesi sino non colo ginocchio in poleere ♣ et ♣ terre, et cio come principe pensa con ogni conscientia pro justitia poter far."

The weakness of the Turk consists in his want of infantry, owing to which he will always be conquered; but if he gain a footing in Hungary, all Germany will go with him (li concorrerà). I never feared the Turk till now; but I shall fear him more if measures be not taken this spring which would make us secure. "Per che con questi campi soli di Lom-

"Come cio deve il Re di Francia, et il Re d'Inghilterra bisogna strengere il reame di Napoli et Lombardia di sorte che Cesare vengi a la rascione et come fara la tregua mediante il Papa et il Cardinale ma il farebbe per la sua prudentia il Papa come confida che la sua immortal gloria come fara questa tregua et imprear et veramente il Cardinale ha qualche occasione al presente per farze inortule. If Milan and Genoa are besieged, the enterprise will be defeated in two months; but this League has not yet besieged either the one or the other. For by the last accounts the French were three days' journey from Piacenza; "si che vedete quello a causato fran ano ruinato et vittuperato dal mondo questo povero papa, quale in efetto e tuta bonta."

Is most grieved to think the Imperialists boast of having done this indignity, not only to the Pope, but to Francis, and to the King as protector of the League; and this they do without money or men. Don Hugo cannot get Naples to give men to go against the Pope. The Neapolitans are ordered by the Emperor to obey his commands. Don Hugo has got 2,000 foot from them, saying that he would send them to succor Sienna by sea; but he has cheated them and us.

"Che il Papa non come sia governato 2' non deve (?) po defendere la fatt. da puzo si nel far lo accordo con Colnesi et crederli, si nel stare in Roma, ove e 2' voluto senza gente sempre guardia a le porte; et ve promesso che mille volte sempre lo ho recordato al Papa che faceva 2' ma Dio o il Diavol li ha tolto lo intelletto." 2510. SIR GREG. CASALE to ———.

On receipt of the news from Hungary, which you will have heard from the prothonotary, the Pope convoked all the cardinals and ambassadors, and was with us more than four hours, beseeching us, with tears, to exhort our princes to make a truce. He proposed a conference with the Emperor, Francis and Wolsey, between Narbonne and Perpignan, where his Holiness also would be present. He intends to send persons to the princes on this subject; and if they agree to it he will go to France, where he will consult with Francis and Wolsey what to do, and then treat with the Emperor as they shall advise. Hopes with Wolsey's aid this peace will be concluded, and an expedition arranged to drive the Turk out of Hungary. He will offer them all his state to settle their differences about Burgundy and Milan. He offers to go in person, and make crosses, chalices and everything for this sacred enterprise, which I promise you should be successful, for the Turks have no great ships, and no ordnance for infantry or men-at-arms; and if an attack were made at once on Constantinople, the Turk would be compelled to leave Hungary. The Pope says, if the princes do not provide a remedy, we shall forthwith see the Turks in Rome spoiling his palace.

Next morning the Colonnas, with whom his Holiness had truce, at break of day were at the Portade S. Janni without the Pope's knowledge, who, having some days before sent out of Rome 1,000 foot whom he had kept as a guard, was obliged to send two cardinals to pray the Romans to take arms in his defence. No one stirred except some friends; and the good Colonnas, with 600 horse and 6,000 foot, of which there were not 2,000 that were not of the rabble (villani), marched through Rome with only a little resistance at the Porta di Santo Spirito. They sacked the Pope's palace, "la mitta di borgo," and a number of houses, including those of (? fin le altre) the cardinal Araceli and the Venetian ambassador, and robbing vestries, &c. Never was such cruelty and sacrilege. The Pope appealed to several Cardinals in vain, till the writer, leaving his house in danger, came to the castle, and urged signor Alberto (Corpi) and the Venetian ambassador not to allow the Pope to suffer so great an indignity. At last, next morning, the Pope held a consistory, and this truce was arranged.

Wrote yesterday by way of Venice. Letters from the Nuncio in Hungary, dated the 6th, giving further details of the battle [of Mohatz]. The Pope thinks this affair so important he has resolved to send Paulo Darezio to France, and the auditor or me to England. God knows, I would have gone to you myself with great pleasure. Need not write about Cremona, as you will learn later news from the prothonotary. Don Hugo confesses having been driven to this enterprise by the danger in which Genoa was placed by the papal and Venetian armies. Rome, 23 Sept. 1526. Signed.

much moment, for Giovanni de Medicis will remain with a great part of the cavalry, as a French captain and many of the infantry will be in the Venetian camp, and it is hoped their wages will be paid. 300 horse and 2,000 foot will go to Rome to guard the Pope. These forces will be of great use to the League there, and deter the soldiers in Naples from coming to Lombardy. They do not think much of the eight galleys, as they consider themselves strong enough to storm Genoa, especially now the French troops are arrived. They say they delayed for fear of fatiguing the cavalry. The Venetians are determined to persist in this course, and hope the kings of England and France will not fail them, especially after the accursed crime of the Imperialists at Rome. A Scot who has been in Hungary speaks of their defeat, but says they have so fortified themselves that they hope to resist the Turk, and that the King is safe.

2520. CLERK to WOLSEY.

Wrote on the 13th. When Tayler came to take his leave Francis desired him to take his way to Paris, and there wait for him, as he intended to leave the next day. On the 14th the King and my Lady removed from Amboise to Blois, where the body of the late French queen remains unburied, "with intent for to set forth her burial towards St. Denis." I was at Blois on the 15th, where I was told my Lady intended to be in two days, at the solemnity of the setting forward of the body of the said late Queen; but she being troubled with her sickness, "and the King occupying himself in his dis[ports], and passing the time in hunting, deferred the[ir] coming hither, and have lien still in certain castles and gentlemen's places in the country [there]about." Tayler, after tarrying three or four days, went to Paris, but I waited, hoping to get audience of my Lady. Heard on the 19th from the Chancellor that the King and my Lady had licensed the most of their Council to proceed to Paris, intending to be there in two days. De Lanson, "being decked to horse" ready to start, came to me, advising I should do the same, as my Lady was still diseased, and not likely to give audience till she came to Paris. Left Blois on the 20th for Clery. Waited there for news; thence to Orleans, "hearkening after the King's a[nd] my Lady's removing, a thing, I assure your Grace, of great instability, and unknown unto them [who] pretend to be of right secret council." Hears nothing of Italy. Tidings have come of Hungary "(God forbid they should be true!)" viz., that the Turk had stricken battle, and taken the King prisoner. Before leaving Blois, had instructed Sanga, and "reformed the minute of Master Dean's brief." Orleans, 27 Sept. Signature burnt off.

He left Cartagena on the 28 Aug., where they had 50 ships, which they had begun to man with Spanish and German troops to the number of 8,000 or 9,000. The Pope does not know what to do if they come; and the Datary says their ruin is certain unless they have immediate aid. Nevertheless, knowing the dangers of peace, his Holiness has refused to listen to Don Hugo, who was making new overtures, saying he had a carte blanche from the Emperor.

ii. "Ex literis nuncii in Gallia diei ultimi Septembris in Bles."

After regretting the calamity of Hungary and death of the King he says the Archduke had recalled the soldiers whom he was going to have sent to Italy, to defend his own frontier against the Turk. The storming of Cremona still continues. Numbers of the garrison:—very strong, but our side hope to gain it, and send 10,000 foot to besiege Genoa by land. Milan is besieged by the rest of the army. Many of the enemy are sick, who have not more than 6,000 able men. Some days ago our admirals caused a "carovana," laden with corn from Sicily for Genoa, to be intercepted. They have taken 23 small vessels and 4 great carracks, laden with corn enough to victual the half of Italy. 2530. [SIR JOHN WALLOP] to WOLSEY.

Wrote on the 17th from Antwerp of his being with the lady Margaret, his [treating] with the Belzars for the exchange, and the piteous news from Hungary. Has been entertained by the card. of Luke at his castle, called Curinghe. He was rejoiced to hear of the King's and Wolsey's convalescence. Ravenstein and the count of Waldeck were present. On the 16th, at a place of the Cardinal's called Stockham, the duke of Saxony married the eldest daughter of the duke of Gulycke, and an agreement was made of a grudge between the latter and the count of Waldeck, who six years ago took away one of the daughters of Cleeff, sister to the duke of Gulycke. On arriving here sent for Sir Hermann Rynge, who could give him no certainty about Hungarian affairs, but he said that on the morrow he would assemble with the burgomasters and échevins, tell them the cause of Wallop's coming, and see if they knew anything.

The news he obtained was various. Some say the King was slain in the field, others that he was drowned in the Duno, and others that he has escaped into Bohemia. The battle was undoubtedly lost, and the King is most likely dead.

Sir Herman thinks that the loss of the battle, although the Hungarians were only 50,000 to the Turks' 150,000, was owing to the rashness of the King and his young council, and because duke Stephanus, who has ever been of a high stomach toward the King, "at the battle giving " and rather annoyed than helped the King.

Some think he did so because he pretends to the crown. If so, he must hold it of the Turk, who is lord of most part of Hungary, and is now marching towards Breslau. He showed Wallop a letter from Dr. Johannes Coelius concerning the battle, and also three books from the Doctor, for the King, Wolsey, and the bishop of Rochester.

The Lords assembled at Spires have determined to send to the Emperor at Martinmas two spiritual and two temporal lords, and four men of the towns, concerning assistance against the Turk; provision against Luther; the election of a king of the Romans, if the Emperor intends to absent himself from Almain; and a General Council.

Hears from Italy that the Papal and Venetian army had practised with the captain of Cremona for the surrender of the town, but the Spaniards discovered it, caused him to let in a number of men, then shut the gates and slew them.

Sends a servant of his own with this letter, and will stay here till he knows the King's and Wolsey's pleasure, unless he hears that the king of Hungary is escaped. Cologne, on the Rhine, 30 Sept. 1526.

P.S.—Herman Rynge tells him that the princes of Almain will remit the election of a king of the Romans to a General Council. Sends a book of what has been concluded at Spires. The Archduke has requested the bishops of Mayence, Treve, and Cologne, and the count Palatine to levy immediately the money granted at Spires for resistance against the Turk. Most of it is already received. Has kept the bearer two days in hopes of more news. The purpose of his voyage is already reported through these countries.

On the 26th the Viceroy set off for the sea. Was told that Barborousus, king of Gigert, keeps the sea like a pirate. The Emperor has resolved that the Viceroy shall attack him at sea, or endeavor to take Gigert. On Sunday last, 25 Sept., news came that the rebellious Moors of Valencia had been slain by an army of Almans and Spaniards. The Empress is with child, at which all the people are delighted. Hears that the Colonnas, since the death of Sessa, have offered their services to the Pope, on condition of an amnesty. The Nuncio urged that neither the Pope's brief nor the Emperor's answer should be sent to England, as he did not wish to have them published; but the Emperor refused. Told the Chancellor there was no likelihood of their publication. Fears that young master Guildford will not survive, as the physicians say he is in great danger. He suffers from flux and fever. He has an open wound on the outside of his left leg under the knee, "taken in the last wars, when he was surprised prisoner with the prince of Orange." "I trust we have made him ready to God. Whatsoever shall happen he hath a good whole mind and no worse stomach. The Lord be his comfort." Granada, 30 Sept.

After Hichingham was despatched, was obliged to send a post with letters from the master of the posts to see that Hichingham was provided with horses, as orders had been given that no post horses should be otherwise allowed. Requests the King will take his news about Italy as mere rumor, and not more. Went to the Chancellor to obtain better information. Heard from him that the Venetians had failed before Cremona, and that the duke of Urbino had left the field. The attack on Genoa by Peter of Navarre has not proved successful. The duke of Sessa is dead. Told the Chancellor he had not seen the apologies spread by the French for Francis not keeping his promise, and stating that in this they had followed the advice of other princes their friends. He told me they were preparing an answer. He also said they had got a copy of the last treaty of Italy, with two secret articles, in which it is declared that the said league has been formed by the persuasion of the king of England, and in the secret articles the duchy of Naples is offered to the king of England for his natural son. At this he laughed heartily, and I said he might judge of the King's steadfastness to the Emperor, that he could not be induced for any benefit to enter the league. I pointed out to him also the contradiction involved in these statements, and that your Highness had already in your realm enough to provide for the Duke your son. He avowed that he "took it for a French posy."

They have heard that the Turks have taken a strong castle belonging to the king of Hungary, who has gone to offer them battle. He told me that the duke of Milan has failed to fulfil the conditions of his investiture, which he has therefore forfeited. Has written more of this by Hichingham. They marvel much that the French king should stop the Emperor's ambassador. Button did not inform me of his going to England. Granada, 30 Sept.

The bailiff of Amphill, who was commissioned by the King to fell some trees there for building purposes, complained that he was prevented doing so by Master Underhill, one of the King's chaplains. The King ordered Underhill to be sent for to make answer before his Council. He did not appear on the day fixed, at which the King was displeased, but four days before he sent Woleman a letter stating that Wolsey desired the matter respite till the term, when it could be further examined by the Cardinal and Master Englefield. Sends the letter, that he may know if Wolsey's pleasure be as stated, in which case he will perhaps communicate it to the King by Master Kingston or by the writer. Amphill, 30 Sept. Signed.

On reading the news to the King, he said the letter of the 21st August from Italy was very old; the other being of a fresher date, the King accepted it in best part. On my reading to him Sir John Wallop's letter, he noticed that it was reported in Flanders that the Emperor had 80 ships ready for transporting his army into Italy. He thinks you should advise the ambassadors of the league to be circumspect. Instead of the billets sent him in all letters for his signature, the King desires that I should have a memorial how the said letters should be subscribed. Teulet, 1, 69.

Instructions [given by Albany] to his Chancellor to show to Francis I., headed: "Mémoire de ce que Monsieur le Chancelier aura à remonstrer et faire entendre au Roy sur le fait d'Ecosse."

1. How the king of Scotland is tyrannically ruled by Angus and his accomplices, who have put to death several great personages, robbed their houses, ransomed several, violated churches, women, and girls. Although the King would gladly escape, and the earl of Lennox lately left his company with the King's consent, and had assembled a body of men to join with the Queen, the Chancellor,* and the earls of Argyle and Murray, for the King's rescue, Angus, being warned, along with Arran, who had joined his mortal enemy, mustered 6,000 or 7,000 men, fell upon Lennox by surprise, and took prisoners or killed many men of his company, of whom Lennox was one. He has banished all the party, and confiscated their goods, intending to destroy the house of Lennox utterly; he has deprived the Chancellor of his office, and removed all the friends of France. All his kindred are murderers, thieves, and men of evil life about the King, who is only 14½ years old. They have no justification for their deeds, and have not called a parliament. Therefore, if Francis intends to make any use of Scotland hereafter, he must provide a remedy.

Advises that John Joachim be instructed to apply to the king of England for his nephew's better security and good bringing up; and if that King will consent that Albany go to Scotland, Francis is to grant him a commission to go thither and put the King and his realm in surety, and return, after he has placed the government in the Queen's hands, and discharged himself in full parliament. He shall also leave with her, under the authority of the King, who shall have a voice in it, a good council of the best men of the country, and replace the Queen in possession of her dowry, on condition that the king of England do not foster Angus or his accomplices; and to this Francis shall bind himself, on pain of confiscation in my goods and person, that I shall not proceed further, but return at the time prefixed.

* Beton; who, however, was deposed from that office in 1526.

† James was 14 in April 1526.

Also, if Francis approve, I will replace Dunbar in the hands of any one the king of Scots pleases to appoint with the advice of the Queen and Council; but Francis must take care, for I fear they cannot keep it so as not to let it fall into the hands of the English. Suggests that an offer might be made to the king of England for a pence or truce with Scotland for defence of the three realms. If Francis intend to remedy it without communicating with England, as knowing that the latter will not consent, I shall be ready, for the honor of God, to go thither with as good will as against the Turks; or, as matters cannot be arranged so quickly, Francis might send to Scotland to learn news of James, and in recommendation of Lennox's children, in behalf of Mons. d'Aubigny; and for this the envoys should have letters to the King and to the Estates, if it be needful to assemble them, and instructions to communicate to the Chancellor, the bishop of Aberdeen, the earls of Argyll and Murray, and also to the Queen. They should ascertain how far each would be satisfied that the Queen should have the government with a council, and what aid they would give me if Francis sent me thither, and obtain promises under their seals. They should give them hope of the continuance of the marriage with a daughter of Francis according to the treaty of Rouen. They should see to the victualling of Dunbar, and convey the captain's pension to him; for they talk of besieging the place this summer, and, if it be not relieved, they will place it in the hands of the English. Prompt measures should be taken to prevent an alliance with England; for I hear that if Henry wishes the marriage between the King of Scots and his daughter, they are ready to place the former in his hands. It would be easy to break the alliance of Angus and Arran; for if they once have the King in their hands the alliance of France and Scotland would be lost.

Thinks Mons. de Saignes should be sent, with a herald who has been there continually.

This day received Wolsey's letters sent to Sir T. More, dated from the More, 29th ult. With the same was a letter from Campeggio, another from the bp. of Bath and Tayler, and a precept for the proclamation touching coins. I read the contents to the King, who is glad to find that certain impediments have arisen, by which his entry into the league may be deferred. He is pleased that Moret should have a commission to treat upon the marriage and perpetual peace, and, at his coming, that the points touched upon by the bp. of Bath's letters shall be declared. Expects Sir T. More tonight. If he should not come, will show the proclamation to the treasurer (Fitzwilliam).

The King, at the desire of Lancelot Lowther, constable of Holt castle, who has attended upon him this summer, and brought him certain casts of hawks, has joined Thomas Ap Hoell, his son-in-law, in patent with him, and desires it may be expedited. 1526.—In consequence of a disagreement between the Pope and the Colonnese, last July, his Holiness collected an army in the city, and the Colonnese encamped at Marii (Marino) two miles off, but a concord having been made, the Pope dissolved his army, and the Colonnese retired into the kingdom of Naples. On Sept. 20, in the morning, the enemy rushed towards the town, to the quarter of the Colonnas, without experiencing any opposition. The Cardinals fled to the Pope. The enemy, numbering 10,000 foot and 1,500 horse, stationed themselves near the house of Card. Pompeius Colonna, and then in a body rushed upon Rome. About dinner time, all the inhabitants remaining quiet, they passed the Sistine bridge, and made for the old town, then breaking down the bridge of San Spirito, which leads to the Burgum S. Petri, they marched straight forward, and the Pope fled to the city of St. Angelo. The enemy attacked the church of St. Peter, spoiling everything, not sparing even the host. All the goods in the palace they carried off, and spoiled the houses of the Cardinals, sparing none, not even the Venetian ambassadors. John de Winckel and Arnold Goltwyet were plundered. The persecution of the clergy and profanation of all sacred things were unparalleled. Your lordship may imagine the outcries of men and women, who are as numerous as they are at Munster. The value of the plunder cannot be estimated. The adherents of the Pope and the Swiss saved nothing but the clothes they wore. All this plunder was carried publicly through the city to the Colonnese quarter. Two Cardinals were surrendered as hostages, and Don Hugo, the Imperialist captain, was admitted into St. Angelo to the Pope, and a treaty was arranged between the Pope, the Spaniards, and Card. Colonna, in which the Pope agreed to renounce the duchy of Milan, to cashier all his soldiers, whom he had there (?), and pay a fine of 3,000 ducats; and if the Venetians refused to accede to it in conjunction with the Imperialists, the Pope should compel them. He binds himself to these conditions on a fine of 300,000 ducats. The army retreated at 24 o'clock to the quarters of the Colonna, returning with great booty, mules and handsome horses, such as were found in the Apostolic Palace. Those in the town were in great consternation, expecting every minute to be plundered; but next day, being the feast of St. Matthew, the enemy evacuated the town. The Pope is still at St. Angelo. No one slept a wink that night, in a town of more than 300,000 people. Rome, 5 Oct.

Wrote on the 1st, and sent such strange and pitiful news as then came from Rome respecting Hungary, and the revolution in the affairs of Italy. As the place where he lay was sickly and incommodious, came to Paris yesterday, expecting the King's arrival, which is looked for this week, as "the corse of the late queen is already lev[ied], and in journey hitherwards, under the conduct of Madame La Duchessa." The Pope's orator was gone to the King to excuse his Holiness for the part taken by him in the last revolution, and for other matters; that the King will form no resolution until he has debated these subjects with his Council in Paris, and taken Henry's advice.

Has received his letters of the 23rd Sept. with a packet for Master Almoner in Spain. Will solicit the delivery of the Imperial ambassador detained at Dieppe. He is accused of sending certain letters of exchange into Lombardy for the Imperial army. Ichingham says that it is difficult to send into Spain, for no one is allowed to pass. People are wondering what the French will do, if the Pope revoke his army from Lombardy, according to his agreement with Moncada. "Then must these men here leave their hunting, and attend somewhat better unto their matters." Happy be we who, through your Grace's policy, have not been drawn into the Italian league, which now, through their negligence, is come to nothing. It is my chance, now and then, to talk with many an afflicted and sorrowful good Christian, who call upon me to exhort the King and you, as they in whom is now the only help and stay of Christendom; for they reckon the Pope is ruined, and the French are slack, and have little care for their own interests, and none for those of Christendom. They join the danger of the Turk with the cruel and insatiable ambition of the Spaniards, from whose fatal and bewitched successes they look for no better than they have found in times past. To whom should they turn for succour, except to the King and your Grace, whom God, they say, has preserved unto this time that you should now do him service. Begs he will consider this, and what men expect from his duty to God. Paris, 5 Oct. Signed.

The bishop of Bath reached Paris on 4 Oct. As I left him I met Ichingham coming with letters from Spain; and as the King was not in Paris, we thought it not desirable that he should return to the court, but hasten to England. His letters were delivered to the chancellor of Alençon. I pray God will amend the news I receive from the bishop of Bath. I have been waiting these twelve days at Paris by the King's command. I saw there the dean of Wells, and on 2 Oct. I was at a Greek lecture with him at 2 of the clock. He is not well settled as yet; for the sudden death of one of his company has compelled him to leave his house, and he is now with a Scotchman,* "a kind and a very, gentle person, and well learned,

It standeth in a very wholesome soil, with a fair and a large garden, sequestrate from recourse of people, having a church within them and daily service, and every night the gate shut. There within is a house belonging to my lord of St. John's. If my lord of Bath and I can obtain of the Great Chancellor that house for Mr. Dean and his company, they think they shall be as commodiously settled as in any place of Paris. As soon as the Chancellor cometh we trust to be sped; for I will not depart out of Paris till I see they be bestowed where they may quietly apply their learning, as they have begun and intend to continue." He must write to Lubeck, Hamborough, and Bremyll not to resist the king of Denmark further, and the letter to be delivered by a herald. He must write to the king of Denmark, acquainting him with the King's goodness in naming him, in the league between himself and France, as Christiernaus king of Deumark, and not Frederic duke of Holst. That when Christiern prepares to vanquish his enemy the duke of Holst, he should have licence to buy victuals here, as they are cheaper than in Flanders. It should be inserted in the commission to Lubeck that Christiern shall put in sufficient surety for keeping his promise henceforth.

2549. FRANCIS I. to the ELECTORS AND OTHER STATES OF THE EMPIRE AT SPIRES.

Has received their letters, and will grant their request for a free passage for their messengers, and desires that they will do the like, as there are many things which should be communicated by each to the other, for the good of Christendom. Is much grieved to hear of the death of the king of Hungary, and the occupation of the kingdom by the Turks. Fears they will invade Austria, which has no means of defence. Germany would then be in the greatest danger, in consequence of the religious dissensions of the people. Has exhorted the Emperor to lay aside private quarrels, and form a league of Christian princes, offering to resign his just rights in Italy that there may be no impediment to peace. The Emperor says that he will refuse no fair terms of peace; but while he is wasting the time by various delays Christian fields and cities are being devastated and burnt. Does not know what other proposals to make to the Emperor, for it is impossible to rouse him, if the danger of Austria and Germany, and the miserable condition of his own sister, do not excite him.

Desires them to impress upon the Emperor the present danger. Promises the assistance of himself and his kingdom in a war against the Turks. Beaugency, 6 Oct. 1526.

There is the same report here about the victory of the Turks as at Cologne. Some say the King died in the battle; others, in flight. The enclosed, sent by Fuckeros Augusten to Dr. Valtasar Ghir, will show him that the King with 90,000 fought against 140,000 Turks, and would have defeated them but for the desertion of the son of count Stheffanus, with 30,000 men to join the Vuda (Waywode), with the intention of making himself king. The Turk has since plundered Buda, and is in possession of the whole of Hungary. Some think he will go on to Austria. Mayence, 6 Oct. 1526.

The Waywoda is said to have written "am Rocasch gen oven aus," in the hope of becoming king. It is to be feared the Turk will gain possession of all Hungary, and make further aggression if not withstood. The Turk defeated the king of Hungary on 29 Aug.; he maintained the field, and inflicted great losses upon the Hungarians; many great lords perished. His Majesty got during the battle into a morass or ditch into which his horse had fallen with him, and the haste to get over it was so great and violent that the person who rode with his Majesty could not help him, and thus he was killed; he is said to have fought bravely in the battle, so that his horse was wounded, and he was impeded in his flight; in this manner many of the most eminent noblemen were slain and perished.

Has sent a servant of his with letters dated Sept. 30. Has heard from a merchant who was in Ovo when the battle happened, and came thence on the 12th ult., particulars of the battle. The King was encamped with 50,000 men on a hill on this side the Duno; the Turk on the other side had concealed his ordnance near the river, and sent over 5,000 or 6,000 men to skirmish, firing a few small guns that the Hungarians might think he had no other. The Turks were overthrown, and a bigger company was then sent, with orders to attack the Hungarians on the hill, retreat towards the concealed artillery, and then open, so that they might be in the very face of the shot. The Turk with his band also retired, so that the Hungarians might think there was no danger. This was carried out; many of the Hungarians were slain by the artillery, but they immediately rallied, and seeing the Turks still flee thought that the shot was all past, and that they could set upon them before the guns were recharged. The rest of the guns were then fired, and the Hungarians utterly broken. The Turk, with all his power, then set upon them, and if night had not come on few or none would have escaped. The King was slain. The Turk is lord over all Hungary, and has burnt the Austrian frontier, which seems to imply that he will withdraw in the winter; but, by the enclosed copy of a letter from the Archduke to the Bishop of Cologne, Wolsey will perceive the contrary. The Turk has 20,000 lanzknechts with double wages. He will allow the people to continue in their belief, paying only half the duties they formerly paid to their King. His ordnance is above 800 great pieces, as well as the small. The Archduke has gone from Innsbruck towards the Austrian frontier. Cologne on the Rhine, 8 Oct. 1526.

Thinks the king of Hungary must have had bad espial to allow the Turk's ordnance to be placed undiscovered, or else he had little experience. Encloses a "contrefaict" of the Turk, which he had from the merchant. Signed.

St. P. i. 178.

I have received news from the foreign ambassadors who were here with me, that the League has taken Cremona, and Genoa is expected to surrender in five or six days. Francis is extremely displeased with the detestable attempts of Cardinal Colonna and Hugo de Moncada against the Pope. Urges the King to give the Pope, for the maintenance of 5,000 Swiss and 400 men-at-arms, 30,000 or 35,000 ducats, by which he may forbear to enter the league, and mediate more effectually with the Emperor. The French king and the Venetians will bear a similar charge. Thus the King will secure peace, have the gratitude of the Pope and the League, save his treasure, preserve his amity with the Emperor; and thus, by his wise counsel, Christendom may attend to the debellation of the Turks. Wishes to have the King's instructions. Sends letters received from Francis. Hampton Court, 9 Oct.

On hearing of the cruel and ungodly demeanour shown to the Pope at Rome, Francis expressed his displeasure at it to the Pope's ambassadors, offering to expose his person in defence of his Holiness, and promising to send ambassadors to England on the subject. He has sent to the Swiss not to recall their men, but grant more for the Pope's defence, and to the captains in Lombardy to set forward, assuring them they shall not lack men or money. The Pope has sent for 4 . . . Your letters to More, dated Hampton Court, the 8th, [reached this] on the 9th; and as More was gone to London, I opened the packet. I read to the King the news from Hungary and its overthrow, which he lamented as lost by the folly of Christian princes thus giving way to the Turk, who would now easily overrun Germany, where Lutheranism was so obstinately supported. He said he rejoiced in one thing, sc., the saying of Christ unto Peter, "Oravi, ne deficiat fides tua." I then read him the Pope's breve, which moved him to great pity and indignation that the See Apostolic should be so violated by a Cardinal's aid; and though he likes your letter of consolation in his name to the Pope, he desires your Grace to cancel it, and write another, inserting that the King exhorteth and prayeth the Pope not to remit his courage, "but to gather himself with wisdom," adhere to the League, and not esteem his promises made to don Hugo and Colonna, as they were extorted by violence. He has some doubt of the meaning of the word "auxilium" in the clause which Knight points out, and desires the word may be qualified. He approves of your letter advising the Pope not to quit Rome, and of your proposition to give the Pope 30,000 ducats. I admonished him of the pleasure and profit he would receive by obtaining the alum mines in Italy. He thinks you should tell the Papal and French ambassadors that these evils have arisen because the King's counsel was not followed, and from the negligence of the French king, and blame them sharply. He thinks the Pope should bestir himself to proclaim a general peace. Amptill, 11 Oct.

P.S.—Has received Wolsey's letters of 30 Sept. As to the matter of chief importance, "that is to say, the marriage, &c., I deemed that the French king's words un[to] me mentioned in your Grace's letters, viz., that his dear beloved brother, the king of England, would have him a good man, &c., should sound to such an intent,* and deemed verily that the practice had been somewhat set forwards; notwithstanding by c[ause] your Grace at that time had not written unto me thereof, [1] knowing also that Morett should be sent to England, [and] as I supposed for that matter, I thought it best that I myself should not be too busy, ne with my Lady therein ne w[ith] none other of the council, but that it should suffice that by other I did procure that these men here were put in remembrance of their necessity of friends, and of that th[ing] that should so much make for their surety and weal, [not] doubting but they should see and feel themselves a cowl[d] and so doing they would themselves come running to blo[w] the coal."

Sanga, before he departed, pressed the matter upon them daily along with the Papal and Venetian ambassadors. "These men here must needs now fall to you, and dou[btless] whatsoever it shall cost them they will have you [in] this league." 2566. ITALY.

From letters of the Prothonotary, 10 Oct.

He writes that the Pope intends to take vengeance for his injuries, and only waits for answers about aid from England and France.

Does not know what is likely to happen now, since his Holiness has begun to recall his forces, to make good the promises wrung from him [by don Hugo]. Sending nuncios and ambassadors seems superfluous, if he wishes to be revenged. If, however, he intends to treat for peace on account of the Turks, it should be done after the recovery of Milan; but it is not likely the French king will make peace on account of the Turks unless he obtain the restoration of his sons, and the Venetians would never consent to peace while the Emperor holds the duchy of Milan. The forces of the League, after storming Cremona, went to Milan, and are now in good spirits, though the affairs at Rome had terrified them. The duchy must now be taken, and then concord can be treated for. Otherwise the Emperor will be so insolent that he will not come to any terms.

13 Oct.—The ambassador of the duke of Milan at Venice has received letters from the court of the archduke of Austria, stating that the Archduke has sent for the nuncio Rovarius, to commission him to persuade the Pope to concord. He intended to procure the removal of the Emperor's forces from the duchy of Milan, and its restoration to the Duke; for he needed the troops to serve against the Turk. The Doge answered that, unless the Archduke had a commission for that purpose, it did not much matter whether the news was true or not.

Letters have come from Spain saying that the Emperor was very much moved at the news of the treaty, had sent ambassadors, but recalled them on receiving the King's letters. The Venetian ambassador had written an abstract of the King's letters, and of the course of action to be pursued, which the Signory approved of. The ambassadors did not make the protestation enjoined, partly because the commission was directed to the Legate, who had at that time left the Emperor, partly because they did not think it of any use. Orders were again sent to them to make the protestation, for the Emperor did not seem to refuse a treaty, but to put it off by prudent words.

The Venetian ambassadors in Spain write that the fleet which the Emperor destined for Italy will not be ready for a long time. The Italians were in great fear of it.

Peter Navarra had great hope of victory with his fleet.

The Venetians are much vexed at the Pope's sudden entry into new alliances, and his observance of them; but it is said that, when he has received answer from France, he will not keep the terms, but assist the enterprise. If so, they will be well satisfied.

At Rome, on a sudden false rumor, a cry was made to arms, and the city showed itself so ready to defend the Pope that he is much rejoiced.

Nothing is determined about sending ambassadors, and it is thought the plan may be altered. There is great distress in Rome.

The nuncio with Ferdinand writes that the Turk will probably keep in Constantinople or Adrianople during the winter. The Turk has sent an ambassador to congratulate the Venetians on their victory, and they have determined to send one to him.

17 Oct.—On the 12th the forces of the League left Cremona for Milan. Some of them will go to Genoa. There is great scarcity and disease in Milan, and a small garrison. The army of the League has 24,000 foot and a great many horse; so that they do not think much of the recall of the Pope's troops, if he would only pay the wages he promised.

The Cardinals have given the Pope much money and plate to place his affairs in safety, and prepare for his journey to the French king and the Emperor, for which purpose the ambassador of Portugal is going to his master to accompany him to the Emperor, on condition that the Pope follows.

Supposes Tuke has showed him his letters. Two posts have passed from Italy to England. Touching the unquietness which the Card. Colonna and don Hugo de Moncada have done to the Pope, they went to find him in his palace before day on the 20th Sept., but he being warned had taken refuge in the castle of St. Angelo. The first news he had of it was by letters from London of the 4th inst., and now many "baken" letters come from Rome to confirm it, and saying that, as to the hostages to be given by the Pope, he and many cardinals gave "causio jurat . . ." to fulfil all his promises, whereupon they licensed most of their men to leave the town, but don Hugo still remained there, well accompanied for his b

My Lady has received a letter from don Hugo, about his doings at Rome. Some consider his going secretly before day to the palace more an act of treason than a valiant or hardy feat of arms; but such things may not be so plainly said here, think what we may. The provost of Cassell writes that Wolsey told him that Cremona was surrendered by the Emperor's party. My Lady has had letters of 23 Sept., which do not mention it, but the merchants' letters say that the army which was before Cremona has left the town well furnished with men and victuals, and has gone on to Genues, where they hope to have as good an answer.

By letters from Spain of Sept. 20., the Emperor was still at Granade, and the Viceroy's army at Carta Gennyas (Carthagena), waiting for wind and weather. He has 40 great ships furnished with 10,000 fighting men.

The princes of Duchland have agreed with don Fernando to raise men enough to resist the Turk. If he have money he will not want men.

The last news from Milan is that Bourbon is not half as well furnished with men and money as he would wish to be to save his honor. Don Fernando has enough to do about the frontiers of Hungary, to prevent him from succoring his neighbours of Italy. Hears that the prince of Orange is going to aid Bourbon with 6,000 foot and 300 lances, to furnish whom he has sold part of his lands.

A merchant from Antwerp says he heard there that Bourbon had come out of Milan half desperate, and had beaten the Venetians out of their field. Sends a copy of an article, in Latin, of news from Rome, received by a friend of his this morning. Sends the names of the principal men killed with the king of Hungary, and a little cipher of his own. Told my Lady the Scotch news he heard from Tuke. She marvels that the queen of Scotland

Erasmus,
II. 46.

Was very glad at receiving his letters of the 4th Sept. from Betica, for not even Lee's priest had heard from him for some months. Has read the satires of "our German" (Germani nostri) against Lee. Was ignorant of most of them, not liking to read writings full of "canina loquentia." Told Lee that Erasmus wrote that he was grieved that his (Lee's) anger had not died away; but now that he knows how the quarrel began, he will, if Lee will give him more information, tell Erasmus the conditions of a reconciliation, and say he must make an apology as being the first offender. Will act cautiously as Lee advises. Lee writes that Vergil has insinuated himself into Erasmus' friendship, but Vergil's friendship is worth more to him than his to Vergil. Begs Lee not to vex himself "quod o dicta in te collata sint, quæ apud posteros auctori fraudi quam ullo nomini tuo malo erunt." Will find out, if he wishes, whether peace or war with Erasmus would be preferable.

Was expecting an account of the men and places in Betica, as Lee says Spain is so changed, and such matters are worth knowing and safe to write. Things here are all well. He gives good advice about the dialogue. It is too important to be entrusted to couriers, who cannot make an easy journey in these times. Was expecting a longer peace. It was destroyed almost before it was ratified. The Turk will take his advantage from it. He is daily gaining ground. Supposes the report of the loss of Hungary has reached Lee. The ambassador is instructed that the King is glad to hear of the Emperor's zeal for the "repose of Christendome, and the extirpation of heresies," and his desire for a "peac universal"; to require the Emperor to moderate his demands as the French king is likely to do; that there is not time before winter for a "convencion" or "diett" of kings; that the King (Henry VIII.) is willing to act as moderator between the several parties in Christendom to unite them against the Turks; that the duchy of Milan

"From my place besides Westminster the xxith day of October."

This long letter, occupying ff. 29-35, has been copied by Baker (MSS. xxxiii. p. 11), who, after noticing the frequent recurrence of the words "the King and I," adds "only the Cardinal's name and title are in his own hand; the letter is in Gardiner's hand, as far as I can judge."

21 Oct. 2575. PATRICK SINCLAIR to WOLSEY.

R. O.

Arrived in Scotland 21 Sept. Visited the King at Edinburgh, Angus and other lords who have the guiding being in the country, except Geo. Douglas. Made the King and Wolsey's commendations to his master, and delivered the letters, requesting him to hear the answer of the instructions sent by James to his uncle, and the message sent by Wolsey. Was desired to remain till the coming of the Lords. Showed him, meanwhile, that evil reports had been made of him by his own lieges, as he had heard from noblemen of England, who regretted that he should have such vices. "His hienes hard me with hwm[il] contynance, sumquhat eschamyt witht litill ansuer, notht denyand his falt, bot ay myndit yat yo King's hienes his derrest onkill and yor graice wor gud on to his moder."

On the 12th October, Angus and his friends came to Edinburgh, when Sinclair presented Wolsey's letter to him, and next day declared his credence, how Angus had misguided the King's person, and held him against his will, not allowing the great men of Scotland to wait upon him, but surrounding him with broken men, dependent on himself, who stopped all justice. He replied he had done nothing but for the defence of his master, and to prevent broken men getting the entire control of him. On the 16th the King commanded Angus to hear the answer of the instructions aforesaid, and Wolsey's message. Which Sinclair thereon declared: 1st, that as to James's marriage, the King thought ambassadors should be sent to England for a perpetual peace, to whom Henry would open his heart more largely. The Lords deferred their answer till the parliament, which is to begin on the 12th November, and to redress many things, as forfeitures of those who opposed the Lords now about the King's person, and to form a Council. 2nd. As to the King's request for the removal of a young personage called Stewart from the Scotch king's mother, James says, his mother had done it already.

After the slaughter of Lennox, the King and the Lords with him, Angus being chief, took Stirling Castle, which was kept in the Queen's name, and Angus delivered it to the Queen, on condition of her putting Harry Stuart, and his brother James, "quha is notht knawin planlye witht hyr grace zit," out of her company. There is a final concord treated of, between the Queen and Angus, for which cause she follows greatly his desire, and binds herself not to solicit for the archbishop of St. Andrew's. Was greatly pleased, on the arrival of Sanga, to hear of Wolsey's good health. They have much confidence in the King as the author of peace between Christian princes, and the champion of the liberty of Christendom. The Pope's thoughts are all concentrated on the means of defending the Lord's flock committed to his charge. The fleet of the Viceroy is hourly expected from Spain, and if it comes, and finds the Pope unprepared, total ruin will ensue. The news by Sanga would have given them greater hopes if it had not arrived when his Holiness did not look for hope, but results. Had aid arrived in time, as his Holiness desired, the pride of the enemy would not have increased to such an unheard-of extent as to threaten the Pope's destruction. He hopes, however, that the King's aid will now flow more fully the longer it has been restrained, and he doubts not that the King and Wolsey will be greatly incensed at the injuries done to the Pope, the Church, and God himself. The safety or destruction of Italy depends upon the King. They are closely pressed, and cannot wait much longer, and therefore the Pope anxiously expects letters from England as soon as the King shall have heard the wrongs he endures. If aid does not come speedily it will be of no use, as Wolsey will probably have heard fully already from Gambara. He is pleased to hear Sanga's confirmation of Wolsey's good wishes, expressed not only by his word but his countenance. Is grateful to find that Wolsey remembers him, and often speaks of him, and will take care to satisfy their wishes in all things. "Nova Turcica ex literis Rorarii xxv. die Octobris Augustæ datia."

The Turk had set out towards Peter Varadin, and sent artillery and an army towards Constantinople. He had on the Danube 3,000 boats laden with Hungarian spoil. Among other things, bells of brass and all kinds of iron goods, 5,000 Hungarian prisoners, and 30 ships laden with Jews. It is thought the Vayvode has agreed with the Turk, and that the latter intends to set him up as King, for the Vayvode's forces were marching towards Buda, and 300 men were occupying the castle. Ferdinand had gone to Hamburg to see his sister, who had set out for Possonia (Presburg), and the princes for Vienna, leaving a garrison of 5,000 foot at Hamburg. As Ferdinand was returning, a German burnt a crucifix. Ferdinand ordered him to be beheaded, and a great tumult was caused, but was at last appeased. News has come to Aragusia, of Oct. 14, from Samandria, a town on the Danube, two days distance from Belgrade towards Constantinople, that the Turk had arrived there, leaving Hungary, as he had killed all the people except 100,000 whom he was taking with him, that he was returning to Constantinople because he had heard that one of his Sangiacs had been defeated on the confines of the Sophy. He did not wish the castle of Buda to be plundered, but gave it in custody to 60 Hungarians, making them swear to deliver it faithfully to their King. Of the 72 counties of Hungary, 12 have been plundered, and Buda and the other places visited by the Turk have been burnt.

"Ex literis domini Cancellarii regni Hungariæ, datis Possonii, iij. Octobris, ad illustrissimum, &c., dominum palatinum et capitaneum Cracoviensem ac regni Poloniæ summum cancellarium (?)"

The Turk pitched his camp in the racecourse between Buda and Theles; has taken Buda and the castle, and returned to the camp. A few days after, he crossed the Danube, and pitched his camp at Rakosch, from which place he made inroads towards Nittria, Cremencia (Cremni), and Casthonia. He intends to pass the winter either at Griminy or Nandoralba.

Buda was burnt against his wish, and the authors of the deed have been beheaded. The castle of Gran was deserted by the captain, and has been occupied by a few men under Matthew Nagh, who found a quantity of stores there, and has sent to the Queen for guns and powder, which she will forward. Doubts not that it can be held. Will send also to Komaron and Theta, and will not neglect the castle of Wishegradien. If these are fortified the enemy cannot ascend the river in boats. The Palatine and others are here, and the ban of Croatia is expected. Nothing certain is heard of the Waywode. It is reported that Nic. Herczik, Pileczki, and Macziciowsky, the chamberlains, have been set free by the Turk, who thinks that the King is still living, and proposes an alliance with him, intending to retain only Sirmium and the country between the Save and the Drave, and offering to protect him against all his enemies. Imbraym Bassa told Herczik that the Turk intended to go to Peter Waradin, and to place some Janissaries in the castle of Buda to keep it for the King. Herczik was honorably treated. Thinks they took him for Thurzon, the treasurer. He says that the day after the battle 1,503 prisoners were brought before the Turk, and put to death, and then buried in a grave with 12,000 other corpses. The prisoners of importance, if they were recognized, were well treated. The head of the bishop of Colocz was fixed on a spear in front of the Turk's tent. He did not know if Dragfli was taken. At Buda, Imbraym asked him if the portraits of the King and Queen in the house of Carolus, master of the Queen's court, were good likenesses; and when told that they were, "Sunt certe, inquit, elegantissimi juvenes." Next spring the Turk intends to attack the rest of Hungary, which is without means of defence, and then Transilvania and the remainder of Europe. Can hardly hope for help, as Europe is in such discord.

Of bishops, the following are dead: Gran, Colocz, Funfkirchen, Waradin (of whom, however, there seems to be some hope), Javarin, and Bosna. Of the laity, Scopus, the brother of the Waywode, Dragfy, Corlaczky, Trepka, Gabriel Peryimy, Hampo, son of Thomas Jeechi, Fras. Orzaagh, Tarchay, Fekothe Mihal, Johannes Paxy, Podmanyczky, and an infinite number of the middle orders; many of the Bohemians, including Stephanus Slyk and Rotumbergh. None of the captains of infantry came back except Anibal, son or cousin of the true king of Cyprus, who led the Papal infantry. The King was persuaded to fight by the nobles and the soldiers, though some dissuaded him. It was said by deserters that the Turkish army, though large, was weak. The King behaved in the battle like a prince. His guard of nobles now all make excuses. Has himself lost everything but life.

30 Oct. 18 Hen. VIII. Verdict of Sir John Daunce, Sir John Mundy, John Kyme, and John Rudstone, aldermen of London,—Wm. Roche, Wm. Dockett, John Pyke, Robt. Draper, Thos. Calton, Wm. Brokett, Thos. Wastell, John Dale, Roger Mundy, Thos. Galsbury, Nic. Bulle, Robt. Trappis, and Hughe Walshe, citizens of London,—as to the fineness of certain coins, &c.

Mem. The oz. Troy has been heretofore divided into 20 dwt. of 24 gr. each, but it is now divided into 22½ dwt. of 24 gr. each.

The King intends, by advice of the Council, to order by proclamation that the angel, which weighs 80 gr. at 20 dwt. to the oz., and 72 of which make 1 lb. Troy, shall be current for 7s. 6d., the demy-angel 3s. 9d., the sovereign 22s. 6d., the demy-sovereign 11s. 3d., the royal 11s. 3d., the demy-royal 5s. 7½d., and the quarter royal 2s. 9¾d.

New coins. George nobles, of the same fineness as the angel, to be worth 6s. 8d. They shall weigh 3 dwt. 7 (?) gr., being 81 to the lb. Troy. Merchants shall pay to the Mint for coinage 2s. 9d. per lb. Troy. Half George nobles, worth 3s. 4d. Crowns of the double rose to be worth 5s. of 22 carats fineness, 100½ cr. to weigh 1 lb. Troy. Half crowns of the double rose to be worth 2s. 6d. 3s. per lb. to be paid for coinage.

Groats, half groats, pence, halfpence, and farthings, of which 1 oz. Troy make 10 groats, and 1 lb. Troy 40s., will be now made at 11 gr. 1d. to the oz., or 45s. to the lb. Troy. 1s. per lb. to be paid for coinage.

Double plakks or Carolus shall be current for 4d. as now. They lack the fineness of the sterling groat, 20d. in every 12 oz. Troy.

Heretofore merchants have paid for coinage 2s. 6d. for every "pounde Towre" (liere Tournois) of 11½ oz., but in future the lb. Troy of 12 oz. shall alone be used, and the payment be as before mentioned.

i. From letters of the Prothonotary, Venice, 30 Oct.

Nothing fresh has occurred. The Signory will send commissions to Spain when they see them sent by others. Italy needs assistance, for if matters turn out badly they will be forced to act according to the pleasure of the French, as the Pope seems already to have done.

If the King wishes the French alone to be the conquerors, and the Emperor to be forced into peace, that would be better than for the Emperor to waste the strength of Italy, and obtain possession of Milan; but if not, the Venetians must be assisted. The Emperor could not have answered more wisely for himself than he did; for if he is unsuccessful he will use fair words, and postpone his resolution; if successful, he will impose it upon all. It is expected that he will come to a resolution when he hears about the Turk. The Venetians are expecting some answer from him, and they have perhaps written to him, urging peace, and saying that unless the duchy of Milan is restored to duke Francis they will hand it over to the French king.

ii. From letters of Sir Gregory, 21 Oct.

Has been with the Pope, but could find out nothing except that he had determined to keep the treaty with the Emperor, and to have a guard about him. He says that unless France helps him he must either agree with the Emperor or flee. Does not cease to encourage him, telling him the princes will help him, and that he must be careful not to damage himself for ever. Fears that the French king, if he sees it is to his own benefit, will induce the Pope to go to Spain; and this is also likely to happen if the king of France will not help the Pope. It must be considered what effect this will have on the authority of the Church, when the Pope is wholly in the power of the Emperor. When the French king was urged to commence the war in Flanders, he answered that he was not bound to do so till the protestation had been sent to the Emperor. The Pope approves of Wolsey's advice for appointing a king for Naples, but does not know how it is to be done unless the French king will consent to its being conferred on the duke of Lorraine, who would be bound to pay for it. The French king is very irresolute, and has not yet paid the money for this month or the last.

Nothing is heard about the fleet at Marseilles.

Peter Navarre says that four large English barks have gone to Carthage, and defeated the Emperor's ships. Has been asked by some at Rome to urge the King to allow Francis to take Milan. The Pope's galleys will stay at Leghorn.

Seeing that the Pope would not begin a war against Naples, which could not be done without collecting money by agreement with the Duke of Ferrara and the creation of cardinals, tried to induce him to commence war in Campania, and not break the treaty. It is difficult to persuade him, as he says he has no money. He has determined to send tomorrow orders to his nuncio in Spain, according to the form which the French have sent here.

2597. SIR ROBT. WINGFIELD to WOLSEY.

Cal.D. ix. 258.

B. M.

Has received his letters of the 18th. On the 25th his commission was read, appointing Wingfield deputy, and he was put in possession. Thanks Wolsey for his advancement. Enters, in his usual style, on a description of his duties. Begs Wolsey will consider that for the space of a year and a month he served the King as ambassador to my lady Margaret, and he trusted to have received his half-year's wages of the castle, due 6 April last. Received nothing, although lord Berners, being the King's deputy, my lord Chamberlain, and Mr. Fitzwilliam were paid their wages. Begs he may be paid, as his property is much diminished. "Pontifex ad hoc devenit ut Rex Gallorum in componenda concordia cum Cæsare diutius durare non potest nisi adjuvetur in ambiguitate non mediocri versatur de [regno] Neapolitano ob rationes adductas a R. D. [Card.] Eboracensi, et super ea re Gallorum Rex non s[e] resolvit, et nunquam respondit ad ea quæ sibi . . . scribuntur a D. Alberto."

Wrote three months ago that the Datary advised (co[n]suluit) the French King to take the duchy of Milan. He has told this to the o[r]ators of the Venetians, who have complained of the Pope's conduct. Francis says he will not take the duchy for fear of offending the king of England. The Datary and D. Albert (Carpi) both say that the king of England is the obstacle to a settlement of affairs. The Datary offered Cremona to the Venetians, by a messenger to the Duke. They are displeased at this, wishing to act straightforwardly.

Does not write this for publication, but that the Legate may know what is happening.

The Datary seems to oppose the creation of cardinals, because he does not wish the abp. of Capua or any of his faction to be created, lest he should lose his office at the Pope's death. The Pope is very poor. Certain people have given him 300,000 ducats.

The Pope would like Medici to be sent to Genoa, secretly hoping when the Emperor's fleet arrives to gain him to his side.

The French king will give the Pope 20,000 cr. if he will grant a tenth and a jubilee. Proposes that the French king should give the Pope 100,000 cr., on condition of his making war on Naples, which kingdom should be conferred on the duke of Lorraine.

The Venetian ambassador does not wish the Pope to attack the Colonnas. Thinks otherwise, and has persuaded the Pope. The Pope will send to Naples, protesting that he does not intend to do anything against the Emperor, and desiring aid from the Neapolitans as his feudaries. The Venetians only want the Pope to help affairs in Lombardy with money.

There will be no battle if the Imperial fleet does not arrive. There is not much hope here from the valour of Peter Navarre. The duke of Urbino intended to advance the siege nearer Milan, and to send part of his forces to Genoa.

2601. LEE to HENRY VIII.

Wrote in his last by way of Bilboa of Moncada's entrance into Rome, and the flight of the Pope. Since then, news has come of the spoiling of St. Peter's. "Some write that the soldiers put the copes upon their backs and mitres on their heads, which savoured more of paynims than of good Christian men." The Emperor takes the matter very heavily, and offers to make amends. "The said Don Hugo, as they report here, is an hardy man, and hath good skill in the war; but few things have hitherto proved well in his hands, and this they account a great blot." The Pope has sent hostages and made an abstinence of war with him for four months. Don Hugo has agreed to withdraw his army to Naples. Is informed that the Pope has sent to the Emperor for confirmation of Don Hugo's act.

News has come from those about Bourbon that Milan cannot hold out for lack of victuals. The Nuncio writes that on the 29th August, the king of Hungary at daybreak gave the Turk battle with 25,000 men. He fled from the field with a knight and a gentleman of his chamber, and as he was proceeding to cross the stream of the Danube, "his horse, being sore wounded in the battle, fell under him, and he overcome with poiz of his armour could no wise help himself. The knight seeing that, leapt off his horse to the intent to help the King, but remedy was none. They were both drowned together. Our Lord pardon their souls! The King did valiant acts in the battle. This telleth the gentleman of his chamber." Does not believe the report that he escaped, as the Queen eight days after could hear nothing of him, his chancellor or his council, all of whom are supposed to have perished. Very few escaped. The next day the Turk burnt Monox, &c. It was supposed he would have gone to Buda. The Queen fled at midnight to Possonia. The suspicions about Bahoida (Vaivoda). By the King's death, Bohemia falls to Don Ferdinand.—The Pope's intended visit to Barcelona, and his desire to meet Wolsey and the Emperor.—Cesar, chief esquire, is to be sent ambassador to the Pope, to excuse the violence at Rome, and punish the robbers, but to express the Emperor's intention to visit his Holiness and save him so troublesome a journey. II. 102.

On the 25th Oct. letters arrived from the Pope to the Emperor complaining of the spoliation of St. Peter's, which the Emperor takes "much heavily and displeasantly." With them came news of a four months' abstinence of war between the Pope and don Hugo, and a copy of a letter from the Nuncio in Hungary, stating that on the 29 Aug. (on which day, four years before, the Turk took Belgrade), the King with 25,000 or 30,000 men gave battle to the Turks, but, being constrained to fly, was drowned in attempting to cross the Danube. Almost none escaped, and neither the King's chancellor nor any of his council had been heard of at the date of the Nuncio's letter, eight days after the battle. After the action the Turk went to Monox and Quinqueecclesia (Fünfkirchen), killing man, woman and child. The King's brother, called Bahoida, kept himself from the battle, which increases a suspicion that he had secret intelligence with the Turk. In consequence of these things the Pope has declared to the Emperor his intention to visit him at Barcelona, and to speak with the French king at Narbonne by the way, and moreover urge the King to send Wolsey hither to promote unity in Christendom, and take measures against the tyrant. If Wolsey come, he should consult with my lord of London and Mr. Dean of the Chapel, who can advise him of many preparations for coming into Spain, not needful for other countries. He must have Alguazeles and Aposintadors sent from this court to meet his servants, and arrange for provisions and lodgings at their first entry into Spain, otherwise he will get neither meat, conveyance nor lodgings. Will see to the arrangements if Wolsey send him his "jiests" from day to day. It seemed, from some words he heard, that the Pope wished the King himself to come. "Methought it was much strange to desire that," seeing the inconvenience of the King's going so far.

Has been five days in bed "under the rule of physie." Granada, 1 Nov.

"The Emperor now appointed Cæsar, chief esquire next to the Viceroy, to be his ambassador to the Pope." He is commissioned to excuse the Emperor for the despoil of St. Peter's, to confirm the four months' abstinence, and to state that Charles, to save the Pope's coming to Barcelona, is willing to meet him in Italy. Is informed by John Almaine that Wolsey's pension for Midsummer is in the merchants' hands. Has not yet received it, having been eight days confined to his bed, and he only rises now to make up this letter to Wolsey, and one to the King.

Since he has been here has written three times. The last, dated the 16th of [last] month, he addressed to Hackett. It is not true that the Turk has taken Vienna. At Ovon he has killed all old and impotent people and those under age, making the rest slaves. He has thrown down divers castles, and is said to be making bridges over the Duno towards Austria, Styria, Carneton, and Crane. The nobles and wise men are abashed, not only by his power, but by mistrust of the Lutherans, and of their own commons. He has written to Nuremberg that he will shortly visit them.

Hears of no great preparation.

Has no ground for his news, but as the voice goes here, but judges it not all untrue.

B. M.

Has received, by Osborne Ichingham, the bearer, their letters dated Granada, 7 and 17 Sept., with a writing in French concerning the reply made to them by the Emperor. Has also seen their letters to Wolsey. In their packet was a letter for Don Ynigo de Mendoza, who is detained in 1526.

France. Has written urgently for his liberation. Caused the letter to be delivered to the provost of Cassel, who has been sent to reside in England by the duchess of Savoy. Received from him an enclosed letter from the Emperor, testifying his desire for the continuance of friendship, and for universal peace. Has also seen the copy of the Papal brief to the Emperor and his reply, an account of what was said to the viceroy of Naples in France, and the offers of the French king for the delivery of his hostages.

Has determined to send the bearer back with all diligence, with letters to the Emperor, of which a copy is enclosed, desiring credence for them.

They must say that the King is glad to hear of the Emperor's zeal for the tranquillity of Christendom, the extirpation of heresy, and resistance against the Turks, who have gained possession of the kingdom of Hungary, which has always been a defence against them. They now intend to subjugate the whole of Christendom, which they will assuredly do unless Christian princes unite to expel them. There is no time to delay the conclusion of a universal peace, for arrangements should instantly be made to drive back the Turks before they get further footing in Germany or establish themselves in Hungary. Will use every effort to procure both a particular peace with the French king and the league of Italy and a universal peace, and thanks the Emperor for consenting to his mediation, which he will accept with the more pleasure, as he knows that the Emperor will consider the cause of God and his Church more than any private claims. For these reasons they must ask him to confirm by acts what he has so honorably signified by writing. Is sure that he will be moderate in the expression of his demands, as he trusts that the French king will be also.

Does not think that a diet of princes or fresh ambassadors would be suitable, for it would cause much delay, as the winter would not be convenient. Suggests that, if he is to be mediator, the ambassadors resident in England should have sufficient instructions. Has written on this matter to the Pope, to the French king, and to the Venetians. They must exhort the Emperor to send the entire, plain, and final point of his resolution, so that the matter may not be protracted and Christendom endangered. Supposes the Emperor is specially concerned in the expulsion of the Turk, in consequence of his claims to Hungary by the death of the late King without issue, as well as for his adjacent patrimonies.

Has declared to the Papal, French, and Venetian ambassadors the Emperor's offer to lay down arms in Italy, if they will do the like. They think it is merely a demonstration, and that he really means to increase his army, for he has sent the viceroy of Naples with a great force; they think that before any cessation of arms, the duke of Milan must be reinstated, or else that the duchy must be placed in the hands of some indifferent person, until the Duke is either proved guilty or innocent of what he is charged with. As the potentates of Italy have their armies ready to defend themselves, it would not be right that, in consequence of the present possession of the duchy by the Emperor, they should be put in danger of losing their states, which would be the occasion of continual war. They must express the King's wonder at the shameful attack of don Hugo de Montcada and the Colonnas on the Pope, at which the King hopes the Emperor is as much displeased as himself. If the reports are true, nothing more detestable was ever done by the Vandals, Goths, or other barbarians. Hears that St. Peter's and other churches were plundered. Is persuaded that it was done without the Emperor's knowledge or advice, and has, therefore, made all possible excuses for him, and will try to prevent its hindering the universal peace.

Has written to request Francis not to make large conditions for the deliverance of his hostages.

Hopes that matters will end well if there is reasonable conformity on all sides, and that there will be immediate arrangements for resisting the 1526.

Turk, to which he will contribute largely, although he is furthest from the danger.

When this is done the Emperor can receive the Imperial crown without incurring any suspicion.

Promises to mediate indifferently without showing favor. When he has heard Don Ynigo de Mendoca's charge concerning the Emperor's debts to him, will act so that he will have cause to be content. Desires them to send the Emperor's reply by the bearer.

Cal. D. ix. 268.

Echingham arrived with Wolsey's letters, 26 Oct., at Paris. The King was at Arttennay, 10 miles this side Orleans. Employed the next day in writing. After that, rode to the King, who is now at Chartres. Lodged at a town three miles from thence, sending to the court to say we had letters requiring audience. Next day the King commanded us to come to him at a place three miles from Chartres, where we were by three of the clock; "and at his coming in, booted and in his riding gear, right sore a-cold," I showed him my letters, stating that although there appeared in the Emperor's late answer a better disposition, yet, if he were well pressed, the Turk being at this "fordell" in the realm of Hungary, and Austria in such danger, the King and Wolsey thought he would condescend to better terms. For this reason a messenger had been sent to the Emperor, of whose letters Clerk submitted a copy, with leave to make what alterations he pleased, and urged him that, considering the manifest danger, he would resolve upon peace, and not be extreme in his demands. He stopped me at this point, saying he had not failed to press the Emperor, enlarging on what he had done and was willing to do in Italy; that he had sent a navy to encounter the Viceroy, and though "the sea was a wide and a vague passage," if they met, the Viceroy would have the worst; and he boasted greatly of his vessels and captains, his artillery, "with other kippaige." As for proposing peace to the Emperor, he said he would follow the advice of England, but the Emperor was at a great advantage, for he had the King's money, and his sons in his hands, and would part neither with the one nor the other; but he asked, if the Emperor would not agree, what would the King do? I said that he probably had learned by Morette that the King would not swerve from him. As it was cold, they thought best to trouble him no longer.

On Taylor's taking leave, Francis "desired him [to] tarry till he came to St. Germain's, which sh[ould be], as he said, within a five or six days after. We offer[ed to] visit my Lady, but the excuse was made that sh[e was] late come in, a-cold, weary, and changing herself; [so], next day after, we went thither again, and [went] to a church of the Celestines, for, there was none [other] house near." Were told by Bayly Robertet that the King would write into Spain by this messenger, but the Chancellor, who had the cipher, was absent. We urged that the despatch of Echingham required haste, and blame would be imputed to us if he were now delayed.

The day after, being the feast of All Hallows, the King sent us word "that he would not trou[ble] us for that day, meaning thereby that we should [not] trouble him." Went thither on All Souls' day. Dined with Lautrec and the Admiral. After dinner spake with the King, who said he had approved of the King's letter, that Echingham should be despatched the same day, and excused himself for keeping us so long,—that his Chancellor and Robertet were away, and De Vand[ome], Lautrec and the Admiral were no penmen. Told us news out of Italy, and the state of affairs there; among other things, "that [the Pope] was at a point with him and the League not to per[form] the articles concluded" with Moncada; that Andrea Doria had again put to sea, and that he contributed 20,000 ducats per mensem for the Pope's charges against the Colonnas, "a thing that I can scant believe." He has sent 20,000 ducats; but that he will continue the same sum monthly, the Pope's ambassador does not believe. I pressed him then on two points. One was to stir him to the wars; the other to prepare himself for this most desired peace; finally, that he would let us know his resolution for the redemption of his children. He was very sore at this; said he could not do otherwise than he had done; that it had been arranged in the last convention between the King and himself. I said the sum was not expressed, and it was needful now to enlarge it, and that the King would mediate better with the Emperor if you knew his resolution. He made no satisfactory answer. I urged that he had good cause to trust the King, "for he was ready to give unto him in marriage his daug[hter], the pearl of the world and the jewel that his highness esteemed more than anything on earth." "He said, by the faith of a gentleman, not only now of late, but also of a long season before his going into Italy," he had a mind to marry his brother's daughter of England. "I said to him, 'Sir, whereat stick you the[n?]' It stendeth only by you that the thing is not performy[d]. I know well that she is offered unto you under such conditions as in manner ye cannot wish them better.' Besides th[at], said I, she is of that beauty and virtue;—and her[ewith], we willing to speak somewhat largely in the laud and praise of my lady Princess, he said 'I pray you, repe[at] unto me none of all these matters. I know well enough her education, her form and fashion, her beauty and virtue, and what father and mother she cometh of, and h[ow] expedient and necessary it shall be for me and for my realm that I marry her. And I assure you for the same causes I have as great a mind to her as ever I had to any woman; but I must do my things as near a[s I] can without displeasure of God and reproach of the wor[ld].'" And here he told us he had promised to marry Madame Eleanor, but he thought the Emperor would refuse her. But, said Clerk, suppose the Emperor do not? I am of opinion that he will be very glad if you will have her; "for what should he do with her? where can he bestow her so well as upon you? Wherefore, Sir, I think veri[ly] if ye axe her according to the treaty, ye shall have [her]." He said, if the Emperor consented he would be advised before he took her, but he was sure they would refuse.

These people are persuaded that they have the Emperor at advantage in consequence of the Turk, and they keep him from knowledge of his affairs. Told the King the horses were ready for him, and he appointed us to be with him in the morning. One for my Lady is dead, and two are not likely to recover, but she shall have four according to the King's appointment. The Great Master and Admiral must wait. There has been no fault in the man who brought them.

2608. COUNCIL OF THE NORTH to WOLSEY.

Are informed by Sir William Evers that the earl of Angwishe had not met him on the Borders for redress of grievances, as settled by the commissioners last being in Berwick, excusing himself as heretofore, having business with the King. The Scots have entered the town of Eddirlawe in Glendale, burnt a house and a child. On Saturday, before All Hallows' day last, a hundred of them entered Buckton in Ellameshire, spoiled the town, and carried off six inhabitants. Intend to provide a New Year's gift for the King, to be sent from my lord of Richmond. Have sent William Amyas to London to provide the same. Requests Wolsey's opinion about the device, and whether they should send other gifts for the Queen, the French queen, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the marquises of Exeter and Dorset. Arrived at Calais with Mr. Treasurer on Wednesday, 24 Oct., with wind and weather enough. Next day declared to the Council his commission to authorise Sir Rob. Wyngfeld, deputy of the town and marches, to receive the keys [of the town] from Sir Ric. Weston, and deliver them to Wingfield, and the keys of the castle from Sir Robert to deliver to Mr. Treasurer (Fitzwilliam). Wingfield gave up his patent of the castle, and took upon him the governance of the town, promising to do his best, notwithstanding his unworthiness of such advancement, &c. He seems to have made a good beginning, both for defence of the town and administration of justice, as Mr. Treasurer can show you. Mr. Treasurer also took the castle into his governance by indenture. These things settled, went with Mr. Treasurer, 31 Oct., to Guisnes, where they found so many things out of order, that it is well Sandys did not delay longer his coming over. Hopes during his abode here to make good reformation. Mr. Treasurer will explain what repairs they find will be needed for the Castle this year. Guisnes Castle, 6 Nov. Signed.

There is fear of war everywhere; for since the sack of St. Peter's and the palace, it is said that the Viceroy is coming with a strong fleet to occupy Italy. The Imperialists are encouraged thereby. The Pope is enlisting soldiers, and recalling his troops from the siege of Milan. He already has 6,000 Italian foot, 3,000 Swiss, 400 men-at-arms, and 1,200 light horse. They are stationed in those towns which are held by the Colonnese from the Church. The Neapolitans are also said to be preparing forces, and they are expecting the arrival of the fleet. It is not known whether it has left Carthage, and Peter Navarre has gone to meet it with a strong fleet of the allies. Genoa has been besieged by the allies for three months, is pressed by want, and will probably soon be reduced. Milan is surrounded by a slow ([len]ta) rather than an active blockade. There is thus no hope of peace except in the King, especially as it is reported that the Emperor has said he will refer the whole matter to him, and the king of France and the other allies will do the same. 2615. ROMAN NEWS.

R. O.

"Ex literis oratoris Fuscari, ex Florentia die vij. Novembris."

A spy, who left [Florence] on the 1 Nov., reports that the Pope made an agreement with the Germans on the 31 Oct., promising them 150,000 ducats, out of which two months' wages were to be paid in hand, and the rest in three months. He was also to pay the Spaniards 100,000 ducats, and had promised them to make three Neapolitan cardinals, one of whom is of the family of Caraffa, and to deliver to them the city of Castellana and the castle of Forli, and to confirm to them Hostia and Civita Vecchia. Hostages were given in the house of Card. Colonna, but under the guard of Germans. The Spaniards and the Germans were constantly falling out with bloodshed and robbery on both sides. In four days the army was to depart from Rome, no one knew whither. The infantry were unruly. Fabricius Marcellinus has obtained the state of Santo Paulo, Sanctum Restum, and Castrum Novum. They were pillaging everything they could, and threatened to return to Rome. The said Fabricius has 22 banners, with 30 foot soldiers under Sent lately to the churchwardens of Browne's parish church of Aldermay in London his letter of excuse about the decay of the chancel, but is still called upon, so that he was never so much wearied about any promotion since he was first archbishop. Has done as much for Browne as he would for his own brother, but they still threaten to sequester the fruits. Thinks, for the sake of quiet and bodily health, Browne had better resign the parsonage for a pension a little under the value. Fears that if the parishioners find their suit delayed by the Archbishop favouring Browne, they will bring it into the Cardinal's court. Knoll, the 9th day.

Wolsey's merits overcome all difficulties in the way of the transaction. Has explained Wolsey's commands to the Pope and Datary. Those about the college and the enlargement of the Dean's faculties are all despatched. About the rest there is some difficulty, through which the Pope does not see his way, especially as he confidently hopes "Regem Christianissimum facturum ne remediis illis sit utendum." First, he repeats what he said before about the arrival of the Germans, and that the Venetians said it was difficult to stop them. They would try to do so; and if it was unsuccessful, they thought that the forces of the League should retreat to fortified places, and the Germans would be destroyed by want, for lady Margaret could not assist them. Their number was about 12,000 foot and 800 horse.

Card. Colonna has been cited to appear in nine days, on pain of deprivation. The Pope's forces have taken all the territory of the Colonnas except Palliano, and have stormed the castle of Mons Tortinus. Fifteen hundred musketeers have been sent to Rome by John de Medici, as he has troops enough to gain the kingdom of Naples. The news from France is that the King does not approve of the mission of Paul Rez to Spain, and had remitted his answer to the council of Paris, which he will attend in ten days.

The French king will pay 20,000 cr. a month, but not the other 60,000.

Acciaïolo had no hope of the 100,000 cr. Francis has provided 40,000 ducats for the fourth and part of the fifth month.

The Venetians are making preparations to stop the Germans, and have ordered the duke of Urbino to march against them. It is said they will go straight to Milan between Brixia and Bergamo. 2628. JOHN HACKETT to WOLSEY.

R.O.

Wrote last on the 26 Oct. Has received none from Wolsey since. At the request of the governor and merchants of the English nation here, has been four or five times before the Privy Council, partly for the recovery of English merchants' goods that were drowned, and saved on the coast of Zealand, and partly on account of some "letters of respyt and kynkynnels" that were given to the prejudice of our merchants in the court of Brabant. They still put us off with fair words. Dined on Sunday last, by appointment, with Mr. Hedding and my Lady his wife. Finds him very loving towards the King and Wolsey. Believes he knows much of the privy of these countries. Advised him to come to England in person, and speak to the King and Wolsey, which he was willing to do, if desired; "and bade me to advertise your Grace to be not too plain in the beginning with a gentleman that comes now fro [Belgium]† to abide there resident whych hys comen name begynys with B." The states of these countries wish to make a reform of the coinage, which "runs in these parts above all reason and the Emperor's commandment," but they cannot see the way. They say it is owing to the merchants strangers, especially the English. They have made a new order about English gold, that no man receive the angelett for more than 11s., or the royal for more than 16s. 6d. B. M.

Received his letters of the 18th ult. informing him of the conclusion of the King and Wolsey touching money and peace, in consequence of messengers from Spain; and the King's intentions in case the Emperor will not comply. The Pope is most grateful that the King and Wolsey are indignant at the injuries he has received, and have resolved to aid him. 25,000 cr. will not be a sufficient contribution for the protection of the Pope, for the 1,500 Swiss will require wages of five gold pieces a month each, especially at Rome, where everything is dear. They would not serve France for less than seven gold pieces. If the Viceroy, who is no better disposed to the Pope than don Ugo, who is now recovering, arrives here, 1,500 Swiss will not suffice. Wishes him, when he presents the briefs to Wolsey, to say that he hopes this present to the Pope is only the presage of greater liberality. Desires peace more than he hopes for it. Puts no faith in the Emperor's letters to the King and Wolsey. Any aid which the King may give the League will only facilitate peace. The loss of Hungary and the danger of Austria would incline the Emperor thereto, but the arrival of 10,000 Germans at Trent and the Viceroy's fleet do not seem to be signs of peace. "Nec video in ipsis literis quam habeat pacis voluntatem, dicens velle se ut judi . . . ducis Mediolani, et relinquatur status duci Borbonii, quia si ista er[ant] concedenda, non fuerat a principio necessarium arma sumere, n[ihil] postulante aliud Casare quam hoc." If we allowed this, [the Emperor] would have the absolute dominion of Italy.

The Pope approved of sending the Auditor to Spain to know what hope there is of peace. When it is clear that there is none, Wolsey will do what he has promised; the King will enter the league and assist us, in which hope we will begin to spend the 25,000 gold pieces.

The [Colonnas] have lost all their property in the dominion of the Church, except the castles of Montfort and Paliano, which, through strong, can[not] resist long, for our army is 6,000 Italian foot, 2,000 Swiss, a large body of horse and artillery, and 4,000 foot from Spoleto and other towns. With money, could resist the Viceroy's fleet, for there would be time to send for D. Joannes and the papal infantry from Lombardy. The danger arises from the impossibility of bearing the expence, which, including the troops in Lombardy, amounts to 60,000 ducats monthly, with no help except 20,000 gold pieces promised by the French king. In a few days Card. Colonna will be deprived. Ascanio and Vespasian will be excommunicated and cursed. Thinks they begin to see their error, now their castles are burnt and destroyed every day. Marino was burnt yesterday, and Galliciano previously.

The Pope, fearing that his attack on the Colonnas would serve don Ugo as a pretext for killing Phillip Strozzi, who was his hostage, sent the archbp. of Capua to ask don Ugo to send him to the Emperor. The reply was, that the Pope must consider all he did against the Colonnas as done against the Emperor. Joannes Antonius Muscetola has come hither from Naples, but has not yet spoken to the Pope.

Thinks that, in the expedition of the bulls, Wolsey's desire will be complied with, so that not even a word will be changed in them, and the clause de fundatorum consensu is omitted. Card. SS. Quatuor informed me that he granted it with a view to prevent similar applications, lest hereafter Wolsey should ask the same circa alia beneficia . . .

The Pope has an army of 7,000 foot, 400 lances, and 1,000 light horse, which now occupy the places of the Colonnese in the Papal territory. Most of their towns are already burnt. The Pope has published a warning to Card. Colonna, and has deprived him, but has not yet published the deprivation. Will send a copy thereof. Hears from Venice that 12,000 lanzknechts are coming into Italy under George Frinzper (Freundsburg), who has mortgaged his castles and towns to pay them. Lady Margaret has sent them 50,000 foot. The Venetians are alarmed, and have sent 4,000 foot to hinder their approach. The affair of Genoa is consequently postponed. The bp. of Salerno has offered to provide 2,000 foot, and asks the Venetians and the Pope to give him 1,500 foot, with which he hopes to blockade Genoa.

The lanzknechts will have much difficulty in coming, if the three principal passes are stopped. The Pope does not think it advisable to lessen the army of the League, lest it should be obliged to go into the towns. Urges him at all events to send to meet the lanzknechts, and to help the bp. of Salerno, which would deter the Emperor's fleet from going to Genoa. Hears that the town would capitulate, but for two or three nobles who are devoted to the Emperor. An ambassador from don Hugo and a Neapolitan councillor have come to ask the Pope not to allow the towns of the Colonnas to be any more burnt; which his Holiness has granted.

Will have the bulls about the college written by the most elegant scribe of the city. The Datary and Card. S. Quatuor say that the reasons adduced by Wolsey cannot be resisted. The Pope will send [the abp. of] Capua to Naples to negotiate the release of Philip Strozzi, and probably also to treat with the Viceroy, if he arrive.

Showed the Pope all that Wolsey had written to him on the 18th ult. His Holiness says he is most anxious that Wolsey should use his efforts for a peace, through fear of the Turk. Don Ugo has already sent to him to complain of the proceedings against the Colonnese, who, the Don asserts, have done well, and he will assist them. The Pope will defend himself, and punish his subjects, as Wolsey advises. He is very thankful for the money given to his Nuncio, and professes his devotion to the King and Wolsey. He will send instructions to his Nuncio in England. He still desires the peace to be negotiated by Wolsey, but does not think the Emperor can be compelled thereto, unless the King gives his assistance, and the French king does more than at present. He will be guided entirely by the King and Wolsey as to his voyage to Spain, and says that the Italians will consent that the duchy of Milan shall be placed in the King's hands if he will say what he will do therewith. The last letters have confirmed the Pope in his purpose. Has told his councillors that Wolsey desires nothing more than the continual splendor of the Holy See, but that any signs of distrust in him would make him less anxious for his Holiness.

Sir Gregory will not go to the Pope until he has been spoken to by others on the subject, and will then tell him that he will acquire infamy and hatred if he makes any opposition. Albert de Carpi writes that a French nobleman has arrived at Venice with a good resolution. The publication of the marriage is reported from Spain. A nobleman is expected thence. The letters and instructions from France are not well understood. The Genoese and imperial galleys are returning from Spain. It is thought they have some design upon Genoa.

It is thought that the Pope will create new cardinals next Christmas. As to the nephew (Philippino) of Andrea Dauria, and his offers, of which I intended to speak, had I been set to Andrea, it is now quite certain. But as Savona was lost I was not sent.

The creation of Hippolito, the Pope's nephew, is also certain. He came to Rome secretly, and only showed himself to the cardinal of Mantua, whom he told that he had come to Rome to be made cardinal, but he remains there in secret because the cardinals were given as hostages on condition that the Pope's nephew should be exchanged for them. On the return of the General, the hostages will be liberated, and he will show himself publicly, and be made cardinal. Was told by the cardinal of Mantua that Hippolito came with Sanga on Thursday. Some say that he came about a marriage; but they mistake him for the son of the duke Lorenzo, who, it is said, will marry the daughter of D. Vespasian. The Pope will appoint D. Ascanio captain of the Church. His Holiness threatens the Florentines, but Ruberto de Pucci, brother of the Card. SS. Quatuor, is secretly treating with him. He intends to create cardinals at the instance of the kings of England and France. The archbishop of Bourges and the duke Maximilian are already spoken of. Hears that Baltassare, servant of count Albert de Carpi, is here for that purpose. The General desires him to create some cardinals of the Emperor's party. Suggests that the King and Wolsey should propose the Prothonotary, their brother, for promotion.

"An abstract of the daily charges for the King's ships yet remaining, the 16th day of November in the 18th year of his [reign]."

Estimate for a year's wages for mariners to keep the following ships, and for the number of cables that each will consume:—The Henry Grace à Dieu: 8 mariners to keep her, at 4*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* a month, counting 13 months to the year. The Mary Rose: for 8 mariners to keep her, 4*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* a month; for 6 cables, 42*l.* The Gabriel Royal: for 10 mariners, 114*s.* 4*d.*; for 8 cables, 80*l.* The Peter Pomogarnard: 6 mariners, 72*s.* a month; 6 cables, 42*l.* The Great Bark: 4 mariners, 46*s.* 8*d.*; 6 cables, 30*l.* The Less Bark: 3 mariners, 36*s.* 8*d.*; 4 cables, 20*l.* (?) The Great Galley: one mariner, 10*s.* 4*d.* The Mary George: one mariner, 10*s.* 4*d.*; 2 cables, 10*l.* The

The Harry Grace de Deuce rides at Norfleet, where she costs yearly 200l. in wages, and more than that in cables, cabullets, and haulers. A dock might be made for her at Erith for 600l., where she might lie at her ease, and more safely than where she now is. A dock must be made for her within these five years, to caulk her, and examine her under water. It will then cost as much as now, and the above charges will not have been diminished, besides the chance of foul weather and ice. The Gabryell Ryall, the Kateryn Fortune, the John Baptyst, the Barbara, the Mary Gloria, the Mary John, the Mary George, and the Neve Barke, cost yearly in wages and victuals 136l. 10s., and in cables, &c. as much more. They are fit for merchant voyages to Spain, Levant, Bourdeaux, Iceland, and Flanders, if they might be set at work; and if not, they will in a few years be spoiled for want of caulking and trimming. The Greate Galey, the Mary Rose, the Peter Pomegranet, the Greate and Lesse Barkes, and the two Robarges, cost yearly 39l. They are good for the wars, or else for the King's pleasure, but their overlops, summer castles, and decks must be caulked shortly after March. Before these ships were brought into dock they cost about 700 mks. a year. The Sovereyn, the Greate Nicholas, the Mari Jamys, and the Harry of Hampton must have "a newe making" before they do the King any service. They spend nothing but themselves.

2637. [SIR JOHN WALLOP] to WOLSEY.

Wrote last on the 3rd inst. Has heard fresh details of the affairs of Hungary. After the battle, in which at least 20,000 Hungarians were slain, the Turk ordered two armies, each of 10,000 horse. One went towards Styre, Marca, and Carniola, the other to Austria, with orders to east down all forts and holds, and to kill the old men, women, and children. The latter has taken Eisenstadt, and killed all the inhabitants. The Turk in person with another army took and burnt Offen, killing all the men without mercy, because they had resisted. He has destroyed all the episcopal seats and places in Hungary, and possesses all the cities except Stuhlweissenburg, in which is the earl of Crabaten with 10,000 Hungarian boors. Earl Stephanus, whom in former letters he called duke Stephanus, holds seven castles, and has 60,000 horse. He is marvellous rich. It is not known whether he will join the Turk or Ferdinand, or do some exploit by himself. The Queen had gathered all her jewels and goods, and put them into a ship to send out of the country, but the bishop of Grana seized them, and put himself and them into the Turk's hands, who for reward beheaded him. Ferdinand has levied 9,000 or 10,000 horse and foot, and furnished Vienna, Neustadt, Maill, and Presburg. The duke of Bavire has all his power ready to assist him. It is reported that the Muscovites have taken Judea from the Turk, who has therefore retreated, but left his army. Hears that the Bohemians proclaimed Ferdinand king at Prague on October 23, to which the King and lords of Poland consented. He is probably on his way now to receive the crown. Some say he pretends also to the crown of Hungary, which will be hard for him or any other of that quarter to obtain without the assistance of other Christian princes. 2638. MORETTE and DE VAULX to FRANCIS I.

Wrote last on the 13th. Are troubled at not having heard since. Yesterday had a conference with the Cardinal at great length about the proposition made by the Emperor's ambassador in the name of Madame Margaret, and the Emperor's excuse for not having entered the league because the ambassadors of the confederates had not sufficient powers. The Emperor expressed his willingness, considering the difficulties made by Francis about the consignment of Burgundy, to modify the treaty of Madrid in this respect, and change Burgundy for a sum of money, which the ambassador begged Wolsey to negotiate. On the subject of laying down arms in Italy, the Cardinal said his King and he were willing, as they had offered to the Emperor, to use their good offices for peace; but the bare offer to this effect did not appear honorable while the duchy of Milan was in the hands of the Emperor; that it ought to be placed in the hands of a third party, like the King, who was trusted by either side,—to be given to the Duke if he was proved by neutral judges innocent of what he was charged with. This answer, according to Wolsey, pleased the Ambassador greatly, and also the consequence, viz., that the armies of Italy on both sides should be turned against the Turk. Accordingly Wolsey said that he had determined to send the Auditor of the Chamber (Ghinucci) to the Emperor, to persuade him to peace and learn his intentions, and that he would be despatched in four or six days. The ambassadors thanked Wolsey for this communication, saying it seemed very expedient, before entering on such an important expedition, to have the advice and opinion of Francis, and thought it would be well if the Auditor were to visit Francis on the way, and show him his instructions. Wolsey answered that the time did not admit of delay, on account of the great danger of the Turk;—an opinion confirmed by Botton, master of the Emperor's household, who came here yesterday from Spain by sea, who also confirms what the Imperial ambassador said about the exchange of Bourgogne for money. This seems to show that the Emperor, moderating his tone about Burgundy, intends that the rest should be settled (che nel resto si compischa).

Botton has also requested England's good offices in negotiating the peace, and says that Francis has made an offer of 2,000,000 crowns for Burgundy. He is going hence to Madame Margaret in Flanders. At his departure from the Emperor's court he had heard nothing of the death of the king of Hungary, of the progress of the Turk there, of the loss of Cremona, or of the failure of don Ugo's expedition against the Pope; events which, he thinks, must incline the Emperor to peace. He approves of the proposition of putting Milan into the hands of a third party, and means to recommend it to the Emperor by letters, which he will send by the same ship which brought him from Biscay. Wolsey says he heard from him that the army of Carthageua, consisting of 10,000 men in 80 ships, conducted by the Viceroy and D'Alarcon, sailed on the 8th ult. for Genoa. Letters of the 20th say it sailed that day, and that 20 ships, worth about 4,000 ducats, were to follow it; but the Emperor, for fear such a booty should fall into the enemy's hands, had caused them to unlade in Carthageua, and put men-of-war in their place.

Letters just received by Wolsey, of the 29 Sept., from the English ambassador with the Emperor, agree with Botton's report of this expedition, and state that the Viceroy had a commission without loss of time to pass over with the army, and go to Barbary, where he took a place,—of which, the writing being in English, they were not able to learn the true name, but believe it to be either Gerbi or Biserti, distant from Tunis, the one about 150 miles to the east, and the other 70 to the west. But it does not seem likely that such an enterprise could be undertaken without great danger on the approach of winter, against a coast which has no harbours. The English ambassador also writes that the Empress has been about three months with child. Hope that count Peter of Navarre, whose advice, if it had been taken, would have prevented the passage of this expedition, will not leave Genoa unprotected. Think any attempt to meet it at sea would be rash, at such a season.

Wolsey intends, if the proposition for laying down arms in Italy and putting Milan in the King's hands be accepted, that the duke of Suffolk be appointed the King's lieutenant, who would go through France with 30 or 40 horse, and take possession of the duchy pending the decision. He intends also, besides taking hostages from the duchy, to place in Pavia and the other important towns as many men as shall be necessary, who shall be Italians of Genoa, which state is to lay down arms in the same way, and perhaps the marquis of Mantua be called upon to take care of its tranquillity.

Last Sunday the Venetian ambassador had his first audience at Greenwich, when Morette was present. He made a fair oration, full of thanks to the King and Wolsey; to which Master More made a premeditated reply, a draft of the speech having been given by the Ambassador to Wolsey three days before, at the request of the latter. In answer to a part in which the Ambassador said the King had not hesitated to accept the protectorship of the confederation, when concluded between the Pope, Francis, and the Venetians, we hear that there was a sentence in the answer declaring that his Majesty, being mindful of his old league with the Emperor, would never accept that protectorship, but offered to use all endeavors to arrange a peace, to which, if the Emperor could not be got to agree, perhaps the King might enter into the said league; with which words the Auditor of the Chamber was much pleased.

Are informed by the Cardinal that he has seen, by letters from Madame Margaret to the Imperial ambassador, that don Ferando has sent 8,000 lansquenets in aid of the Imperial army in Italy, which were to arrive at Trent on the 26th ult. As this confirms the news they last wrote, they hope Francis has taken measures to stop their passage. As Wolsey had no news from Wallop since the capture of Vienna, he did not know whether the Turk had left Hungary, as it was said. Nevertheless, letters from Flanders confirm the intelligence that the Turk has withdrawn, leaving garrisons in three places, and has taken the road to Constantinople. They also confirm the news of the dispute between don Ferrando and a prince of Hungary, pretending to the crown. London, 17 Nov. 1526.

2640. JOHN CASALE to [VANNES].

From letters of the prothonotary Casale, 18 Nov.

Has shown the Doge (Ser^m Princeps) Wolsey's letters, the news from Rome, and what he thought expedient to be done. They gave answer today, approving of Wolsey's advice to continue the war in Lombardy, thinking there was no better way of compelling the Emperor to peace than this war, into which, they say, they were led partly by necessity, and partly by the advice of the King and Wolsey. If they had foreseen the event they would have been more careful about their own interests. They had placed their hope in the Pope, who, for well known reasons, has failed to begin, and in the king of France, who has performed his promise slowly. They expected aid from the king of England, which has not come; and now they are in great danger, owing to the fleet and the arrival of the Almaines, whom they cannot resist, and they therefore beg for assistance.

Wolsey may be sure that the Signory desire nothing better than peace by the mediation of the King. Their ambassador in England has instructions about it, and they will send fresh instructions to him. They will do all they can to further it, and give all the honor to the King and Wolsey. But they say there are many great difficulties to be considered. First, the Emperor's words do not come from his mind, for he could have obtained a better peace before, and many think he merely wishes to gain time for his own affairs, and keep the king of England from taking part with France. The Signory do not think that arms can be laid down soon, even if all parties agree. Another difficulty is the state of Milan, parts of which are in the power of both parties, and would not be safe without a great army, as now. But still matters can be discussed, the limits remaining as at present.

The Emperor's proposition to examine duke Francis's justification, and to appoint another duke, is not fair, since Francis has been elected by the advice of the King and Wolsey, is the lawful Duke, will be more easily received by the people, and is accepted as Duke in the treaty, so that the allies cannot honorably elect any other. His errors consist in this, that he treated with the Italians, his friends, to help him if the Emperor deprived him of the duchy. They bring forward other things also, which the Duke wishes to have openly proved. The Signory thinks him fitter than any one else. This league treats of electing a Duke not powerful enough to be dangerous, to whom it can be lawfully granted, and be agreeable to the people. All this he is, and is independent of any prince; and why should not the Emperor rather make him Duke who has served him so faithfully, than one who might join the French faction? Maximilian or any other creature of the Emperor would not be accepted by the Italians. If the Emperor wants peace, he must seek what is honorable to both parties; if he consent to this, everything else will be settled easily and quickly, especially if he will set free the princes for an honorable ransom, and pay what he owes to the king of England. Has asked them to write to their ambassador in England to declare everything by word of mouth. They have not spoken on this subject in consequence of anything he has said about the other Duke, but their Nuncio writes that Wolsey spoke about Bourbon. They will hear of no one but duke Francis. The Pope would prefer the French king. It will be best for the Emperor to confer it on duke Francis, as he is honorable and safe to the Emperor.

The army of the League is in the same place as before. Urbino has resolved to change his station, and encamp on the Adda, that he may the easier protect the river from the Almain, who, he thinks, will come down into the Veronese and Mantuan territories. Their descent was opposed by Camillo Orsini with 150 lances, and another captain with 3,000 foot. It is now known that they will come by another unusual way, and Hereules Rangone has been sent on thither with 400 foot. It is feared, however, that they may turn through the Brescian county, and the army has gone to the Adda to protect Bergamo.

A man named Vestarini has been discovered attempting to betray Lodi to the Imperialists. He has escaped, and all is safe.

Italy is between fear and hope. News has come that the Imperial fleet has arrived at St. Florence in Corsica, and that the fleet at Genoa is hastening to attack it. There is great hope of their success, as, though the Imperialists have more soldiers, the allies have a most skilful leader and 38 galleys, which is more than the enemy have. Has received two letters from him of Oct. 31 and . . Nov. Delivered the King's letters to my Lady on Saturday last, about 5 o'clock, after dinner, in presence of lords Ravystayn, Bergys, Hoghestrat, Palermo, Rossynbose, the chancellor of Brabant, the Treasurer and Receiver General, and secretary Marenny, and all lords of the Privy Council. When these had been read, she asked for Hacket's credence, which he delivered. She said she would do her devoir in all that the King had written, and would give him an answer in writing in three or four days. Delivered the King's letters to the Governor here, who says that at the first court day at Barrow he will show his company the King's and Wolsey's wish about these new printed books, and will do his best to bring them to nought. He will meantime issue an order to all of his company who are here for the "anychylment" of these books. It was necessary for Wolsey to have provided for this, for many men speak as if they would fain consent to this new heresy, which God defend, for every fool would think [to] be a doctor. Hopes that my Lady and the Council will soon assist him according to their promise.

Came hither on Monday. These two days has been trying to agree with the principal merchants about the exchange, but none would make any bargain, as Wolsey had limited him to 4s. 6d. st. for the ducat, as a ducat of such gold as they would be bound to pay would be worth 4s. 10d. st. in the mint. They must receive either ducats, or a crown of the sun and a groat st. for every ducat, or the sum in angellets. The best thing would be for one of their factors to go to Wolsey. The gold can be kept at home for two or three more per cent., for they would be glad to give that to take it out of the realm. Antwerp, 21 Nov. 1526. Signed,

Of the horses that should have been delivered to my Lady one died 14 days since; I suppose another is dead by this time; "the 3rd hath the glanders very foul, and is lame afore. The horses were young, and by all likelihood had taken some heat." Thinking it was not right that my Lady should be disappointed, "and because the ornaments were such that they might of themselves, without horses, be in the lieu of a goodly present; and at the leastwise we knew well that it should be a very simple horse, which, decked with these ornaments, should not appear and have the face of a goodly horse for the season," Clerk preferred a couple of his best horses to this honor. "Master Welsborn to furn[ish] up my Lady's four set the fornyments upon a ve[ry] good ambling nag of his own."

On consulting with my Lady she appointed Saturday last for receiving the presents; when I and Welsborne "delivered the King's highness' and also your Grace's unto her." She received them with many kind words. "It was a great frost and [a] very cold wind, and I saw that she was loth to go abroad. I axed her to whom it should be her pleasure that the said horses should be delivered. She answered, Nay, Mons. mon ambassadeur, I must needs see them, be it never so cold. And with that [I] caused them to be brought about upon a fair green under her chamber window, which was glazed on the inside, and panyd with paper on the outside; but she causes both to be opened, and then, a good long season in a very cold and sharp blowing wind, she saw and beheld her horses led and going three or four times, all one after another, in very goodly and comely manner. There was no man at the window but she, the Admiral and I." She was highly contented, and said she must furnish the King and your Grace with mules. Her son made her a feast the last day of his horses, and she will have one of them, but she said she could not get him, and when her son came home she would make him a feast of her horses and thought he would like them, but he should not have them. "And then she showed me once again of the pictures sent unto the King's highness, and of a new device made upon the same, saying that she was sure it should be well liked." She desired to see Welsborne before he departed, as she would write a letter of thanks by him.

Has not been able to deliver his last letters to the King, exhorting him to peace and an expedition against the Turk. Told Madame of their effect, but she and the King only gave general answers. They said they desired no man's possessions, but as for the Emperor no one knew what he would have.

They hoped, as the King had been the only man to help the French king out of captivity, he would now assist in delivering his children. They proposed to send a nobleman into Spain to demand Madame Eleanora: if she is denied, then to protest that the King claims liberty to marry where he likes. They profess in this and in all other matters their desire to be guided by England. Clerk suggested that under present circumstances the Emperor would not stick much upon Burgundy, but be contented if they paid the money and fulfilled the marriage. "In this case, intend you [to] accept the marriage?" She said her son's mind had been for a long season "clearly fixed upon the daughter [of England] as upon that thing that should be most profitable to both realms, and also, considering her age [and her] virtues, most pleasant and delectable to himse[lf]; and that Madame Eleanora, being now of the [age] of 30 years, and for (far) other qualities, and thus f[or] to take her and buy her so dear I might rig[ht] well be assured that the King her son, if he m[ight] choose, should not gladly set his mind that w[ay], were she never so much the Emperor's sister." She urged he never could expect any help from him, seeing how he had treated his other sister, and how devoid he was of natural affection; and she asked what he thought Henry would have them do to end these interminable wars. "Hereat, to be plain with your Grace, I somewh[at] staggered; for to repeat unto her such reasons a[s] should dissuade the marriage of madame Eleanora [I] thought it no time." She had rehearsed them already. But I urged one reason for her own consideration, "that Madame Eleanora was now of that age that there should not be found, peradventure, so much good nature and humility in her as in my lady Princess, whom now in this age and after this education she might bring, fashion, forge up and make of her what she would herself, assuring her that my said lady Princess should be as loving, lowly, and humble unto her as my said lady Princess should be to her own father and mother. On my faith, she held up her hands, and cum lachrymis said that I said truth; adding that if it should be my said lady Princess's chance she would be as loving and humble again unto her as to her own son, and that she should be as much esteemed, worshipped, honored as ever was queen in France."

Clerk urged that his master was anxious for the union, and if the welfare of Christendom did not require such celerity, means might be found for delivering the children without marriage with the Emperor's sister. Is much afraid of this marriage, as the Emperor is in no points very easy, "but in this as I hearsay, vovit et juravit, that the French king shall never have his children until he hath actually married his sister according to his promise." My Lady has at times urged that, even if her son should be compelled to marry Madame Eleanora, means might be found for knitting the amity between the two crowns; hinting at a marriage between my lady Princess and one of their children. On his last talking with her she urged that the realm of England ought to have a ruler of its own, and therefore the Dauphin "should not be meet. She said Mon. d'Orleans, whose name was Henry, and resembled the King's highness in name, face, and all his jests and manners, should be meet and great and acceptable enough to the commons and nobles of that realm if he in his youth should be brought up amongst them." Was not very forward in accepting this proposition; said the Dauphin might die, and then M. d'Orleans would be in his case; and urged that he had been sent to learn from her what would be best to establish the amity of the two princes, as Wolsey would be governed accordingly.

The Emperor sticks only to the marriage and the money, and will not care for the Pope or the Venetians or the imperial crown so much as "the redubbing of his empire." The French are not concerned if Bourbon should obtain Milan:—the difficulty is with himself, for the Emperor will not let him have it except for life, and charges him with 200,000 ducats yearly and the keeping of 500 men-at-arms.

No news of the Viceroy. The army has retired from Milan. When Sanga was sent to England, came here Paulo de Aretio, whom the Pope wished to send to the Emperor for peace; but those men are so jealous they will not suffer him to pass, and agree that the king of England is the sole mediator. No one is allowed to pass with letters. Poissy, near St. Germain, 22 Nov.

P.S.—Met yesterday Albany in the court by chance, who offered his services very civilly to the King. He said "he was sorry that the king of Scots was so kept, and that he, now in his youth, was evil brought up, and in no good company." He said the King ought to look to him. "I said that I supposed the King was well ruled, and that through his patience I did think that if there were now any evil rule or disorder in that realm it was through his default," and there was some part of his faction there. He swore that he never meddled there, and never would; and offered further talk. Does not think he is much esteemed. The Bohemians have chosen the Archduke for their King. He has sent succors to the Emperor in Italy. Walsborne will be despatched tomorrow. Poissy, 23 Nov. Signed.

2652. JOHN HACKETT to WOLSEY.

By his last letters, dated the 21st, wrote that, as to the exchange that he was to make "toward Almany," his commission did not allow him to conclude except at 4*s*. 6*d*. the ducat, while the ducat of Hungary being of full weight is worth here 4*s*. 10*d*., and the merchants say such payment would be a loss to them of 10 per cent. Has conferred separately with the principal merchants of High Duchland. The Folkys would have nothing to do with any exchange. The Welssys would, only on condition that they were allowed to export gold and silver, and would not take less than 5*s*. for the ducat and 9 per cent. interest, or, if they left their money in the realm, 13 per cent. Thought this exorbitant, and finally agreed with Ambrose Hogastettyr, as Wolsey will see by a notary's instrument inclosed. Could make no better bargain, but Wolsey may either agree to it, or be discharged with 50 ducats. The merchants of Antwerp are informed by letters from Spain that the Emperor has ordered the 100,000 ducats in Fernando de Beruny's hands to be appropriated, one-half to pay his men of war in Duchland, the other to be delivered at the King's pleasure. Thinks if Wolsey were content to pay the 25,000 ducats of Hungary here, they would be willing to serve us for six or seven per cent. rather than take it there as contracted.

Since coming here, has made inquiries about these new printed volumes of English translations (Tyndale's Testament). Finds there are two in this town who print and sell them. Has written to my lord of Palermo, who has got my Lady to order the Margrave of this town to see these errors remedied. Has seen the Margrave himself, who promises to do his utmost.

Finding some delay here necessary to execute his commission, sent on Wallop to Cologne on Saturday. Encloses letters for the King and Wolsey received yesterday from my Lady. If the Emperor sends his money by exchange to Duchland, it will raise the exchange here one or two per cent.

Encloses two of the new translated volumes. Hopes within a fortnight to see many of them a-fire. A proclamation will shortly be issued against printing, buying, or selling such books. Antwerp, 24 Nov. 1526. Signed.

On the 17th, news came that the Emperor's fleet arrived at St. Florence, in Corsica, on the 2nd, and that Peter Navarre intended to go thither, and had sent word to Andrea Doria and the provveditor of the Venetian fleet.

The Imperial fleet consists of 34 ships of 500 tons, with 5,250 men. Owing to the wind, they have not yet been able to leave the harbor, and it is thought the fleet of the League will defeat them. Andrea Doria's friends in Corsica are trying to prevent the fleet from getting victuals. Peter Navarre will not blockade the fleet, lest he should be himself blockaded.

The larger French ships have been for 16 days at the island of Yeres, opposite Marseilles, with orders to sail as soon as possible to Villa Franca. It is thought that Peter Navarre had determined that the ships should follow Laurentius Toscanus, who has been sent to the Pope by the French king's mother. Toscanus has been on board Peter Navarre's ships, which he says are 16 in number, some with 12 great cannons, with which they could easily sink the Imperial fleet. The Viceroy knows this, and means to go straight to Genoa. Navarre and Doria intend also to go thither.

The Germans have already crossed [the Alps]. If they come by Bergamo, the duke of Urbino will attack them, and the duke of Milan will go to Lodi and Cremona, and fortify other places so as to stop them. The Neapolitan ambassador strongly urges the Pope to cease his hostile acts against the Colonnas; but his Holiness will not consent, except to abstain from burning the country. He has today publicly deprived cardinal Colonna, and the

The Emperor's answer in Council to Lee's credence.

Understands the King's wish for a universal peace, especially since the late successes of the Turks, from the danger of which no power of Christendom is free. He has accordingly sent Inigo de Mendoza to negotiate this subject with the king of England. Cannot go into particulars at present till he knows the intentions of his adversaries. Will see by his letter to don Inigo the answer he has made to the Pope, who proposes to come to Barcelona. Justifies himself for not laying down his arms, as his enemies still continue to augment their forces; and, considering all things, thinks that the king of England would not persuade him to do so. Begs the King to believe that the outrages at Rome took place without his cognisance, and he has made due apology for it to the Pope. 29 Nov. 1526.

2663. [CHARLES V.] to INIGO DE MENDOZA.

R. O.

Has received by Dr. Lee the king of England's letters, and copies of those written to his ambassador. Sends copies, with the answer he made to the ambassador, that he may know what to say to the King and Wolsey. "Here followeth the cipher."

Besides the old amity, he has the most perfect love to the King his uncle, for his great benevolence at Charles's last passage by his realm, and his assistance to him in passing "to these our realms." As hinted in Charles's answer to the ambassador, Henry is misinformed about the affairs of the Pope, the French king, duke Francis of Milan, and other potentates of Italy. That he may know our good intent you are to make copies of all that is past on both sides, "as well with the French king and us, as also that toucheth our justification with the Pope;" in which is included the matter of duke Francisco, and all other faults they would charge us with. You are to request the King and Wolsey, for the love of us, to hear the whole matter that they may understand who is to blame for these wars now in Christendom. It is strange that at the very time the Turk "searches the entry and the destruction" of Hungary, and when we and our brother the Infant Archduke have made preparations to resist the Infidel and suppress the Lutherans, we are forced to abandon so good business for our own defence. God knows what efforts we have used with the Pope for a general peace. It is true, as mentioned in our answer to the ambassador, that we have been desired by the Papal and Venetian ambassadors to enter into the league; to which we have answered that this would be unreasonable, as the league is entirely against us and the quiet of Christendom. Moreover, it was not reasonable that we should accept the league before seeing the articles, which the ambassadors said were not sent to them; and we told them that perhaps by omitting some articles, and adding others, so as to convert the league into a good universal peace, we might accept it. On this the ambassadors said they would write for instructions, believing that their masters, the Pope and Venetians, were of like mind. Hopes, therefore, that a good arrangement will be come to.

You may therefore tell the King that we shall be conformable to his advice, and that we shall have singular pleasure that the—(here are five or six words in cipher)^{*}—as is contained in his letters, trusting that he will have good respect to the—(about three lines of cipher)—"to the which, for our part, he never shall find occasion of discontentation."

"And to the end that our said brother know that not only to the said—(three lines of cipher)—inclined as it is said, you shall say to our said good brother that he knoweth well that—(one line cipher)—for the observance of the capitulations of Madrid.

that we have to the universal peace, and for to come to that we shall be content to all things honest and reasonable. And forsomuch you shall say to the Sire King our brother that he may clearly see that in us is not fault to the universal peace of all Christendom—cipher—the good assistance—cipher—praying him to continue in his goodwill and put his hand to, that—cipher—the rendering of the castle of Milan—cipher.—We purpose to do rightly, good and short as now not othirtoo (hitherto?), but much time past we have offered to our Holy Father. Hackett writes that the bills of exchange cannot be sent till he knows Wolsey's pleasure concerning certain points in the contract. Does not think it well to spend any more time in this town, as the diet is now beginning at Eslynge, which is little more than a day's journey out of his way, and he has to deliver the King's letters to the princes of the Empire. The letters will overtake him before he leaves Eslynge, or at least at his arrival with the Archduke. If they do not arrive then, will be in doubt how to proceed, especially if a King is erected in Hungary. Has delivered the King's letters to Herman Ryng, with the two packets of Luther's matters. He will not fail to fulfil the King's pleasure, and to direct the letters to duke George of Saxony and the cardinal of Mayence. Has tried him to see what he could do about the letters of exchange; but he says there is little enough money for the lords and princes to aid Fernando against the Turk. "[Ex literis] . . . Novembris datis ad D. Prothonotarium."

Has informed Wolsey in his letters of the state of the Pope. Doubts if he will consent to any peace, as he cannot trust the Imperialists, and Sir Gregory urges him rather to go to Venice, if he can no longer resist. News came today from Corneto and Civita Vecchia that the Imperial fleet, which consists of 20 ships, had arrived at Porto S. Stephano, near Porto Ercole, and on the 29th they began to disembark. The Florentines' only hope is John de Medici, who is wounded, and it is thought will die. The Pope has today assembled the Cardinals to deliberate on some convention with the Germans to cease from molesting the Pope, and also with the duke of Ferrara. Now, at the third hour of the night, the Pope is still with them. The Datary says the Pope will make peace, or a treaty or truce, whichever he can. Will advise him to go to Venice rather than trust the Imperials or the archbishop of Capua, but doubts his timidity. The galleys of the League could not attack the Spanish fleet on account of the wind. Is, however, surprised that the larger French ships should have allowed the fleet to arrive here safe. Fears the French are not acting sincerely. If the king of England wishes to help the Pope and prevent the Emperor's monarchy, he must be careful, before incurring any expence, to ascertain what Francis will do, for he is obliged to sustain larger expence than ever, for the recovery of his sons, and to send forces into Italy.

This morning many cardinals have been to the Pope concerning the creation of cardinals, but he has given them no reply. Spoke to him on the subject last night. He would rather submit to anything than make new creations.

The Portuguese ambassador, Aguilera, the Neapolitan ambassador, and the archbishop of Capua, with other Imperialists, were with the Pope before the consistory. Jo. de Medici sent Gabriel Cassano to request the Pope to create one cardinal, who will pay his Holiness "qu[inquaginta] millia ducatorum." The Venetian ambassador promises 80,000, and many others will pay 40,000, but he obstinately refuses. Now, at the seventh hour of the night, the Datary tells him that the Pope will send a noble to ask the Viceroy for mercy. Warned him not to trust the Viceroy or other Imperialists. The whole College calls on the King for assistance.

2671 JOHN CASALE, Prothonotary, to VANNES.

Wrote on the 29 Nov. that the Germans had crossed the Mincio, and that Urbino would not follow them further, as it was impossible to prevent them. Artillery has come to the Germans from the duke of Ferrara by a ship, which professed to be carrying salt. John de Medici has been wounded in the leg, and amputation will be necessary. Capt. Benedictus Mandulphus is dead; also Pompeius the son of Ramazottus, who was serving at Marseilles under my brother, Sir Gregory,* a nephew of Maceo and others. No one attacked the Germans except these and Aloysius Gonzaga, who had two horses killed and his helmet pierced by a two-handed sword. The Mantuans and the brother of the ambassador here say that only 25 of the Germans were killed; but a certain Horatius, serving under Urbino, says there were 800 missing. They ought to have been attacked when crossing the Curtato. It was madness to attack them in the defiles. Horatius also told him that Urbino's delay arose from his ignorance of the country whence the Germans were coming, and because the Venetians, fearing for Vicenza and the towns near, took 3,000 foot from the army at Milan, contrary to Urbino's advice. Asked him if there were enough men left to resist the soldiers in Milan. He said there were, and that they were in a strong place. It is not known yet either what the Germans or the Venetians will do. Went yesterday to the senate, to try and find out, and encouraged the senators. Said to them that the Germans will cross near Hostia, and go towards Rhegium or Parma, trusting in the aid of the duke of Ferrara, to join their friends; but it is thought the army of the League will be able to stop them; or they will go to help the duke of Ferrara to take Modena. If that is too strong, they will go to Bologna, or into Emilia or Etruria. The Pope will be in great danger, especially when he sees the Venetians, from whom he hopes for aid, moving either not at all, or late. If they order the Duke to cross, the Germans will be stopped; they will find the Pope's army thoroughly prepared; they will encourage every one, stop the duke of Ferrara, who will spend no more, for he values 100,000 cr. more than the Emperor and his daughter, even if it is true that his son has married her.

Hopes that the Emperor's fleet has been defeated, so that the Pope will be able to send some of his army hither, and make the victory easier. They would confirm the kings of England and France if they act with energy ; and he advised them to decide at once and write to Rome. They agreed to what he said, but would not say what they were going to do. Yesterday talked with the Pope's legate about these matters ; he said he hoped the Venetians would do much. The French ambassador spoke to the senate yesterday on the same subject. Of the Germans there are 14,000 in wages, including camp followers, 18,000 or 20,000. The League is very unlucky. They pay wages, and the Imperialists never ; but still men desert from them to the latter. When the Swiss musters take place, if 10,000 men take wages, one half are Germans. Andrea Doria writes to the Florentines that the fleet of the League took first a brigantine with the persons who were going to provide for the arrival of the Spaniards at Genoa, and afterwards fought the Spanish fleet. They were stopped by night coming on, but Doria thought they disabled many of the enemies' ships, and in the morning would capture them. Suspects he has over-estimated the injury done to the Spaniards. The rest may proceed to Naples. They are, however, prevented from going to Genoa. Intercepted letters from Genoa show their necessity of victual, &c., and they will surrender now there is no hope of the fleet. Their fleet should pursue the Spaniards to Naples. 2678. SIR CHRISTOPHER DACRE to LORD DACRE.

Cal. B.vi. 420.

St. P. iv. 460.

The earl of Angus did not come to Coldstream on Wednesday or Thursday, the 28th and 29th of November, as he may perceive by the Earl's letter enclosed. Has appointed the 13th and 14th of December. Does not believe he will be there. Gares, who is at Edinburgh, came on Friday last. The Scotch Parliament began 12th Nov., continued to the 27th, and is prorogued to the 8th Jan. All have left Edinburgh. The Queen was met at Corstorphyne, in a small company, two miles from Edinburgh, Tuesday, Nov. 20th. The King and the Queen rode through the town to the palace. "The Queen lyes in the chambre where that the Duke lay, and the King lyes in the chambre above her, all in a lodging. The King is a-mynded not to lye far from her, nor he will never be frome her excepte he be owder hunting or sporting."

The lords Cassilis and Avendale are in the hands of Arran and Sir James Hamilton, to ransom at their pleasure, with others of the West of the party of Lennox. Lindsay and others of the same party are in the hands of Angus and George Douglas, to whom the lands of Carr are forfeited. Rynyane Creghton, who was in the keeping of Dumlangrig, has agreed with him and is restored. Buckleugh is respited, and was in Lithguo on Sunday, to the great displeasure of the Carrs. The bishop of St. Andrew's has leave, but refuses to come to court "unto he see the court changed of an odre fashone." He has given to Arran the abbey of Kilwynnyng, to Angus 2,000 marks Scotch, to George Douglas 1,000, to Archibald Douglas and Sir James Hamilton the same. His kinsman, the abbot of Arbroath, has been all Parliament-time at Edinburgh.

Drurye, a monk of Murouse (Melrose) Abbey, has got the bulls for the same, to the great displeasure of lord Maxwell, whose brother will thus lose it, though by an Act no Scotchman may procure a benefice from the Pope without the King's licence. Neither the earl of Argyll or Crawfordth were at the Parliament. The laird of Laughenbarr (Lochinvar), who slew the laird of Bondbye in St. Giles's church door, goes up and down at his pleasure in Edinburgh, to the contempt of all justice. If the Queen remains with her son, the court will have a turn. The King loves not Angus or Arran. Gares, the bearer, will tell him more. Norham, 2 Dec.

Postscript.—"My Lorde, I beseeche your Lordship to speke with maister Chaunceler for som amendment of this housse, for of my fedelite ther is never a chambre but it doys rayne in it, hall, kitchyng, ne odre." Signed.

"[Pin]alosa missus fuit ad Pontificem et [Cardinales] a Vicerege cum literis credentialibus. Ego omnino [puto quod] ad aliquam conventionem deveniet cum Vicerege . . . quod secreto id faciet, dumque illi dicerem quod in ang . . . scripserat nomine ejus Sanctitatis, quemadmodum deer[e]verat usque ad ultimum resistere, et quum plus no[n] posset aufugere Venetias, nunc vero tractaba[t] de concordia." To this he answered that his flight would do no good.

The Pope will come to an agreement if he can, and he has sent the Neapolitan ambassador to the Viceroy as a mediator. Thinks the Pope has been advised that the French king and others will be induced to do more if he gives up his neutrality (si se eximat ex medio), for Francis will not be able to practise with the Emperor, as the latter will not care for him when he has the Pope on his side. Understands that his Holiness has also been told that as soon as he concludes with the Emperor, he will get as much money as he desires from Casale, Monte and others, and that he will be able to supply the Viceroy if he is in want.

Tells the Pope continually to beware of any agreement, but he hears as if mute and deaf, and says nothing but that the French king will only give words, and three months have passed since he said that he could do nothing more without help.

The Imperialists will have no power of restraining the Colonnese from injuring his Holiness.

The French king is said to have offered 2,000,000 g. cr. to the Emperor to satisfy the king of England. The Emperor will not consent, but means to do what the Pope wishes. He intends to divide the duchy of Milan between Bourbon and duke Francisco, the former to hold Milan; and he hopes the Pope will help him in this. His Holiness will ruin himself if he makes a separate peace. It is to be feared that the Viceroy, knowing his timidity, will gain access to him; and he is already deliberating what to do if the Germans come. Tells him he must by all means entertain them for a month, for the Imperialists are few and needy; and the Viceroy, who will not be able to get money from Milan as easily as from Lombardy, will change his purpose.

“regis et ex illius bonis verbis, sed
Sanctitatem admonuit ut nullo pacto illis verbis cre[dat] sed ut vicissim bona verba det et cum secur[itati] undique prospiciat, id quod se facturum dixit destituitur viribus quas oportet.” Told him to be careful, for if he made a separate peace or truce he would have no more help, either from England, France or Venice.

Does not think the Italians can be prevented from making peace with the Emperor unless the French king assists them with a large number of Swiss, or the king of England enters the league.

They see by experience that they can do nothing against the Emperor. If he had those 20,000 cr. now, he would not give them to the Pope without a promise not to enter any treaty with the Viceroy at least for a month. The Florentines are enrolling 6,000 foot for their defence.

Pinalosa says that the Viceroy, at his departure from Cartagena, received letters from the Emperor, saying that he took very ill the outrage by the Colonnas, and all the Imperialists said that the disasters at sea were a judgment for the plunder of the Church.

The Pope replied to Pinalosa that the Vice[roy] must come to him, or else he must send to the Viceroy. Exhorted him in the King's name to make a universal peace; which may be hoped for if he holds out for a month. If, however, the Pope wishes first to settle his private affairs, the writer does not see how matters can succeed well. The Pope has fortified Bologna, Modena, Parma, Florence, and Placentia.

His Holiness says that this treaty with the Viceroy will be made by force, and he will keep it like that he made under compulsion in the castle, if assistance is provided to free him from slavery. The Colonnas are said to be enrolling soldiers, so that their forces and the Viceroy's will amount to 12,000 foot.

The despatch of the post will not allow him to write at much length. The Emperor has received the King's letters with great joy, and is sending secret instructions to don Inigo. As the ciphers were deciphered in France they are fain to alter them, "which is a strange dealing, if it be true." Inigo's detention in France has much injured the common affairs, as they will not now send their secret instructions by Ichingham. Does not know what they will do. The Emperor desires the King will obtain Inigo's release, as he will not entrust his determinations to any other. Hopes the King will find all as well disposed as the Emperor. Told the Venetian ambassador it was not convenient, as he proposed, to have these matters discussed in France. Heard from the French ambassador that he was ready to conclude with the Emperor for release of the King's children. Objected, that it would hinder the conclusion of the peace, and that the Emperor is ready to leave. Will hear more by Ichingham. It is thought the Emperor will send an army to Constantinople. Before the arrival of the King, the master of the posts, by the appointment of Alaman, had received 1,000 ducats upon the pension of Palanee. He has offered to pay it to Lee at any hour. But as the other 1,000 will come shortly, due at Midsummer last, that it may be paid in a lump sum, "I forbear to make to your Grace by exchange these 1,000 ducats already received." Thanks Wolsey that he is permitted by a warrant to Mr. Wyat to receive his diets out of the money, thus saving the rate of exchange. For 100 days, beginning the 27 Nov., the sum will be 600 ducats, "which is more than my diet 33s. 4d.; the which the prior of St. Mary Overy's, to whom I shall send the warrant for Mr. Wyat, shall pay, to make the whole sum to your Grace."

On asking John Almain how much was due to him of Wolsey's pension, he answered "he would nothing take of your Grace under name of pension." I told him I used the word pension, having no better to express my meaning for Wolsey's benevolence towards him. He said he intended better service towards your Grace than calling in a little money.

Since then I have received your letters empowering me to sue for the arrears of your pension due for Tournay, and offering Almain 500 ducats for his service in the affair of Toledo, and for the 9,000 ducats due for Tournay 500 ducats yearly, and, if he can attain the whole arrears, 2,000 cr. I have been secretly advertised that the Emperor had given orders that the pension of 9,000 ducats should be paid, and should be augmented by 6,000 ducats, and it was once in parole to give you as recompense for the whole the bishopric of Burgos, worth 18,000 ducats. Consulted with Almain how the arrears of the 9,000 ducats might best be obtained. He replied that the Emperor had instructed Mendosa and Button that your Grace should have them secured on the best crown lands in Spain. Promised him in general terms that he should be rewarded if the thing succeeded. On my telling him that I would speak to the Emperor, he said it was not needful, for he would do all, and have letters sent to Inigo and Button.

In communication with the Emperor, at which De Pratt was present, the former said that your Grace had deserved well of him "for the good handling of this business between the King and him." Hereupon De Pratt greatly commended you, and said it was necessary for the Emperor's welfare to entertain you, and that his Majesty should see your pensions better paid. Has spoken with the abp. of Toledo, who refuses to pay your Grace's pension unless he sees your bulls. I told him this looked like rigor, not to pay except he were constrained; and that your Grace marvelled he would make such frivolous excuses, as he knew that the Emperor had appointed this pension on his bishopric. He said he could not pay it without express authority from the Pope, that his conscience will not let him, and that there is no mention of it, as you say, in his bulls. As he is ready to pay on proper authority, thinks that Wolsey should send the transumpt. Hears that there is a reservation in his bulls of 10,000 ducats, to be disposed of as the Emperor shall appoint. Intends to apply to have Wolsey's dues paid out of that sum, so that when the matter comes before the Emperor, the Archbishop's "ignorance pretended shall be discussed, and his conscience discharged." The bishop of Palance has now promised that this Christmas pension shall be paid in March, and the pension for Midsommer at Christmas.

Details a long conversation he had with Almain for Wolsey's pensions on Tournay. He estimated the arrears at 40,000 ducats, and wished to have a full account sent. I said nothing, as I was not aware what arrears might be due to you. Urged him again to receive an annuity for his pains, but he refused to be considered a pensioner. I said to him, smiling, that he thought 200 ducats was too small a reward. I then told him your proposition that for the recovery of your spiritual pensions on Toledo and Palance you would grant him 500 ducats yearly, and a like sum for the recovery of the others. "Here he yielded, only answering, It is too much; but I will not take it as pension. No, said I, but as reward and liberal gift." I offered him also a further reward of 2,000 crowns for speedy payment within two or three years. "He promised his best, and said not nay." Granada, 2 Dec.

Has sent by Ichingham other letters touching his credence from the King and Wolsey. Sends now by this post, "which cometh by sea," a copy of the Emperor's answer touching his credence, which is but general, the particulars being answered in the secret commission and instructions given to don Inigo. Is informed they are so large and clear, that they cannot but satisfy the King in all points. The Emperor could not entrust any one but don Inigo with matters of such weight, and prays Wolsey, if he be not yet arrived, to write letters for his deliverance, and ask the King to do the same. The Emperor accepted Wolsey's credence so joyfully, thankfully and lovingly that at one point, viz., "that your Grace upon your knees, &c., he could scant refrain the tears." He said, in answer, that he took Wolsey for his friend and father, and would always be guided by his counsel. Excuses the briefness of his letter. His clerk has been compelled by illness to go to England. 2685. JOHN CASALE, the Prothonotary, to [VANNES].

The fleet of the League, thinking it would do well to keep the enemy from Genoa, forced them into the port of St. Stephen, near Piombino, in the Siennese territory, than which they could have chosen no better place to injure the Pope. They landed, as he will see from Sir Gregory's letter, of which a copy is enclosed; Sienna furnished them with victuals; and they can either march to Rome or Florence. If to the former, they will obtain the aid of the Colonnas and of the 6,000 foot chosen for Naples; if towards Etruria, the Germans will assist them. Urbino's hindrance of the Germans from crossing has benefited the Spaniards. Everything succeeds with the Emperor, even when he is asleep. These Germans, joined with the Viceroy, will amount to 25,000 foot, besides a body of cavalry at no expence and artillery. The duke of Ferrara will help them, and they will get money from every city. He can imagine the Pope's state of mind now, when he feared these Germans when they were in Germany, and these Spaniards in Spain. He has sent the general of the Friars Minors to excite their compassion. There is now real cause to apprehend that he will not persevere.

Fears the inconstancy of the Pope even more than Sir Gregory does. Has always suspected his Holiness of an understanding with the Imperialist ambassadors, more from terror than fraud, since the day he saw that the League was not successful. Thinks that, if there has been any intelligence, it proceeded from don Hugo without the knowledge of the Colonnas; for if so, the destruction of many lands under the Pope's rule (where but a very small part of the domains of the Colonnas lie) would inevitably have taken place. It is not to be believed that the Pope would be so imprudent as not to take advantage of the truce, and wait till he saw how Italian matters would succeed, and what would be done by the Germans who he knew were coming, and by the Spanish fleet. It is not likely he would wish, the Colonnas being thus destroyed, to break a truce on account of the French king, who has offered him 60,000 cr. in three months, and the king of England, who has only given him 25,000 in one portion. Sir Gregory's letters will show how ill the Pope thought of these offers.

It was necessary to do something against the Colonnas, to vindicate the insult to the Church, with the consent of don Hugo, who cares solely for the Emperor's profit. The Don perhaps wished only to frighten the Pope, but the Colonnas to take him and plunder the Church, even against the Don's wishes. Sir Gregory does not believe this, and the Prothonotary scarcely suspects it; but they wish to tell him everything. Fears rather that the Pope will make some truce with the Imperialists; for if he had no previous intelligence with them, and broke the treaty to their injury, how could he negotiate with them? Would it not be safer for him to shut himself up in some fortified city, or go to Venice? He would not be safe in any city of his own; and he could have no access to Bologna, as the Spaniards hold the roads. Anything would be better for him than to trust to their good faith.

Went this morning to the Senate. Guicciardini has written from Modena to ask them to order Urbino to cross the Po, as the Germans have done so, and are approaching the Papal States; he has also asked the marquis of Saluzzo to come to him from Milan with the French troops. They have ordered the Marquis to cross with 500 lances and 3,000 or 4,000 French foot, and they will send 10,000, partly of those paid by themselves and partly of those paid by the French king, including 3,000 formerly under John de Medici, who has died of his wound. Urbino will return to Milan; that is, to the country above the Adda. The Doge said that he knew the King and Wolsey were well disposed to Italy, but that now they require real help. The Italians and the French are not strong enough to carry on the war alone. No peace is to be hoped for from the Emperor; for even when his affairs were in danger, and he seemed ready for peace, he was really preparing new forces. Everything will now shortly be in his hands. The Doge promised that they would do all they could, and told him to write to England for help. They seem hopeless at Rome. Does not know what the Pope will do. Sir Gregory continues to look to everything.

Wolsey is right to dissemble in concert with the French, and with them devise the best remedy for defeating this monarchy (in monarchia hac fugienda). The Viceroy has always urged it on the Emperor, and sown hatred in his mind to the King and Wolsey; and it is not likely he will consent to have the matter arranged by them. He hates the French king for deluding him, as well as the Pope and the Italians; and he will rather endeavor to subvert everything, provided he can bring them into subjection to the Emperor. The Pope will stick to the confederates as long as he can, but Casale fears that the Viceroy will compel him not to assist in expelling the Spaniards, or perhaps even to help them. Thanks Wolsey for having expressed himself favorable to the continuance of his mint, as he is informed by the prior of Christchurch and Ewyn Tomson, the bearer, keeper of his mint. 2687. LEE to HENRY VIII.

On the 26 Nov., the day after Ichyngham's arrival, delivered the King's letters to the Emperor, and declared his credence; all which he took "much joyfully," especially the King's desire for the public tranquillity, "which he avoweth himself more to desire than any other wealth or health that he may have in this world," and, knowing the King's impartiality, he has no fear to put himself in his hands. Forwards the general answer he has made in writing. As to the particulars of my credence, he has sent large commissions to Mendoza to give you satisfaction in all points, and hopes, if the latter be still detained in France, that you will procure his deliverance. He says you would have known much of his mind long ago but for Mendoza's detention, so that it is not his fault things are so protracted.

Was asked by the French ambassador about the answer he had received from the Emperor. Told him the Emperor had sent a commission to England to treat and conclude before the King as mediator, so that if other princes did the same there need be no sending to and fro. People here do not think the French king will send a like commission to his ambassador in England; and when Lee spoke about it to the ambassador here, he answered, "that he had now commission to conclude for his master's particular affair," i.e., deliverance of the children, declaring that his master would never forsake the League of Italy. It is hard to believe the report of enemies, but some things I hear seem to show the French king has little trust in you. Was told by my lord Chancellor, in presence of the Nuncio, that the French pretend don Inigo was detained because he had a commission to treat with England for delivery of one of the French king's sons to Henry. Trusts the King may find as much towardness in the others as in the Emperor. The French ambassador doubted if the Venetians would accept the four months' truce.

One Cornelius,* who was with the king of Denmark in England, now being here, predicts some great business in Italy about Our Lady's day, the Conception, now at hand. He has gained much credit by the fulfilment of former predictions. "Doubtless he is in the judicials of astronomy the most excellent young man that ever I have known. He is not yet 26 years old. He told afore of the French king's taking, and the day, as my lord Chancellor told me; he told the Viceroy afore his departure that he should have danger of fire in one of his ships, which followed." He says the eclipse that will be on the 10 Dec. signifies mortem magni sacerdotis. "God only knoweth certainly what shall follow, who turn all things to good that otherwise, by the influences, may be dangerous; and He turn his ire and grievous hand from us, and send your Highness continuance of prosperous health!" Refers to his letter to the King. Hopes Wolsey will be content with it, as he has no help of any writer. The French have deciphered Inigo's instructions, for there is an Italian in France who can decipher any cipher. Urged the Emperor for secret instructions to be sent by Ichingham. They would give no answer to his instructions, but refer all to don Inigo; and as the instructions contain the Emperor's profoundest thoughts, he would not commit them to any other. He heard my credence gladly;—said that he knew your Grace had furthered the King's good mind towards him,—"that it well appeareth that his good friend had the devising and penning of the King's so kind and gentle letters, and that your Grace should not call again to remembrance any things of times past, which he now perceiveth were otherwise than they were taken, and that he hereafter will evermore love your Grace as his loving friend and father," &c. "And at the point of your Grace's credence that on your knees, &c., I assure your Grace he changed colour as a man yielden and relented, and scant could contain his tears. He is of good nature and tractable, and inclinable, and as I perceive so be all his council inclinable," &c.

Declared your mind to De Pratt according to the clause of the Duke's letter. "He was the most glad man that I have many days seen." He said that during his life he would be true hearty servant to the King and you, and there was no country to which he owed so much as England. There is nothing, he said, went so near his heart as your's and the King's displeasure; so nothing made him more glad than to be restored to your favor. He is here in great favor; never out of the Emperor's privy chamber, except time of council. It is thought he will be chancellor. He is going to Flanders. "Like it your Grace that I may know your pleasure, whether I may comfort him to come by England." Thinks a little letter to the Chancellor, who is all the King's, would be advantageous. Count de Nassau also favors the King, "but somewhat abhorreth from council." Thinks he should have a letter of thanks. A servant of his, named Antoine, some time steward to the Bastard Emery, had a pension from the King of 100 cr. per annum, which is now restrained. He professes his willingness, however, to serve the King, even if he is deprived of it. As he desires the continuance of the King's pension, thinks he should have it. Strongly recommends the bearer for his great diligence and pains. The Emperor will, doubtless, long to hear from the King, but when the messenger arrives he will be at Valladolid in Castile. Nevertheless, they know of the summonses that have been sent to the Emperor to enter the League, and the conditions therein, and that, to satisfy him, sufficient powers for treating have been sent to the French, Papal, and Venetian ambassadors in Spain, that the Emperor may plainly declare his intentions, "parquoy on pourra de brief faci[llement] ledit en nes chascun aura sa rais[on] prendre autre voye ne moy[en] ne se pourra faire, et que ledit Em[pereur] et ny voudra entendre." Now that the [Ger]mans have penetrated into the States of the Church, and the Viceroy has arrived with his fleet at the port of St. Stefano, nothing can be added to their miseries. Will be ruined if princes friendly to the Pope do not send assistance. When he last wrote heard that the Viceroy had landed at St. Stefano, whence he can attack either Florence or Rome. News came that he had landed no men, and that the fleet had gone to Gaeta, whither the Pope sent the General of the Order of St. Francis to discover his intentions, and to make the same demands which he had already made in the Emperor's name. [No] answer has yet been received, but a message sent that they will go to Naples to consult about the Pope's affairs, and then return to Gaeta; and they desire the Pope to send a messenger to say whether he has power to conclude peace or truce for the other confederates, and, if not, whether he will conclude alone. Yesterday he replied that he had authority to conclude a suspension of arms, for the Venetians agreed with him, and he thought the French king would be contented with it; but that a treaty of peace required more time, and he would try to obtain the assent of the other allies. Are waiting for the Viceroy's reply, which will probably be a refusal of peace, or such conditions that it would be better to suffer anything rather than consent to them. Sees that the Pope is well disposed to do nothing except with the consent of the allies and by the advice of the King and Wolsey, and to defer agreement with the Imperialists as long as possible. The necessity is extreme, and he is forced to accept what conditions he can get, but he does not wish to give himself a prey to his enemies, and desert his friends. He thinks it would be better to fly from Rome. They will not sleep in the kingdom of [Naples] as long as these negotiations continue. The forces on the frontier are increased, and the Colonnese threaten that they [will do] worse things [to the Pope] than they have done already. Throughout Rome property is being carried into the houses which are considered safest.

The Germans were at Guastalla, and expected to come towards P If they had come to Bologna or Toscana, which were badly fortified, they would have thrown everything into confusion. It was thought that the duke of Urbino would follow them across the Po, and keep them back; but after the wound of Sig. Giovanni * his ardour cooled. Giovanni had his leg amputated, and died on the 30th. The Germans have now crossed to this side of the Po. The marquis of Saluzzo will, however, cross with his forces to defend Parma and Piacenza, whither the Venetians have sent 1,000 foot. Know what to expect from their friends, for when the Pope was shut up in the castle nothing but words came to him from any one. Have not yet received the 25,000 [cr.], as the bearers are afraid to cross the sea. There is no news of Renzo or the French fleet. The duke of Ferrara has given money and artillery to the Germans, and also to those at Milan, that they may go out freely. The Pope has ordered ten or twelve galleys of the fleet to go to Genoa, and the rest to remain at Civita Vecchia. Count Peter of Navarre has gone with a commission from the Pope to defend Florence against an unexpected attack of the Germans.

2700. JOHN CASALE, Prothonotary, to VANNES.

Wrote last about the straits affairs were in, owing to these Germans, and the landing of the Viceroy's fleet in the territory of Sienna. Sends a letter from his brother about the Pope, and the sailing of the Viceroy towards Naples. From the promises of the Imperialists to his Holiness, many fear that he will procure some composition or truce, which he would not do if left alone, since the effect would be, not to stop the war, but to increase it, as the Imperialists, seeing the Pope on their side, would be easy victors; but the victory would ultimately fall on his own head, nor could he hope for further aid, either from France, England, or Venice. Many, therefore, think he would rather make a truce with consent of Venice, France, and England; but if he thinks this expedient and necessary he would probably inform his allies of it, so that, even if England refused, they could scarcely draw back, and during the truce a universal peace could be treated for, with the Pope for arbiter. It is certain peace could not be made without a previous truce.

The Germans and those marching against the Pope have returned towards Milan, and are at Stella, near the Po. Urbino has left Malatesta's forces at Cremona, and gone to Soncino to speak with the marquis of Saluzzo.

There is no further need of the Marquis going himself to assist the Pope's cities, but they will deliberate where to stop the Germans from joining the Spaniards. Asked the Doge what he thought about the Pope. He said he did not think matters so desperate; but no dependence is to be placed on what they say here, as they never speak openly of their plans. If the Pope continues to resist, they will stand by him, but if he yields, they must also. The expence is becoming very heavy, and he thinks they are dissatisfied with their generals; and therefore a truce now would be advisable, as the Imperialists are the more powerful, and it is impossible to storm cities in the winter. The Emperor has tried to do all he could. If a peace did not follow the truce, the Italians would be able to reassemble their army; but the Emperor would not, probably, as he enlisted his Germans, and raised the money for them, by pretence of a war with the Turks. Thinks the best plan would be a truce, and then a treaty for universal peace to be settled by the King and Wolsey, which would be just, as they have assisted neither side, nor been at all suspected. If peace cannot be obtained without continuing the war, would wish the King to be concerned in it, either by money or by name, because then no confederate could, without breaking his faith, commence any treaty without the express consent of the King and Wolsey, and the Emperor would be more likely to name them judges of peace, seeing they are armed, and that nothing could be done without them. If the Emperor then sees that he can treat with the States alone, he will not care about England. It is no use telling the French king that we are his allies, and he can make no peace without us, when he can answer that he is not able to urge war any longer, and we will not help him. Already they are flattering the Pope, and asking him to be arbiter. Thinks that his Holiness will certainly prepare some composition. Venice, 8 Dec. 1526.

Item cum de rebus Italia sit cum eis sermo, dicunt se nullum interesse habere in eis, nisi quod fœdus illud, in quo singulis mensibus exponunt milia scutorum, ad id tantum intrarunt ut filios recuperare possent. Nec a supradicta opinione recedo propterea quod rex Gallorum dixit velle per proprium oratorem requirere Casarem ut ei det dom. Eleonoram, ad hoc ut negante Cesare, quod pro certo tenere assurunt, honorificentior via regi Gallorum pateat ad discedendum a matrimonio dom. Eleonore. Nam non videtur verisimile [ut] hoc expectent a Cesare, cum non videatur Casarem posse dom. Eleonoram alibi maritare. Præterea, ut ipsimet dicunt, dum alias ipsi peterent dom. Eleonoram id sibi negatum non fuit, sed dictum quod servarent promissa dom. Eleonoram habendi, quod etiam nunc verisimile est eis dictum iri. Et sic hoc est frustra tempus conterere. Quare ego credo hunc oratorem ad alium effectum mitti; sed ne confederati aut alii aliquid suspicentur, et sic sub hoc colore.

hunc non miserat, respondit quod fuerat habitus respectus ad confederatos ne suspicarentur, sed quod, postquam habuisset saltem conductum pro quo miserat, hominem hunc mitteret. Puto itaque, ut dixi, hanc alio tendere et etiam, sperare Gallorum regem sub hoc clypeo resolutionem matrimonii in aliquis hebdomadas dilaturum; et ad idem tendere puto quod Rex dixit velle interim de particularibus circa matrimonium Anglum tractare, præsertim dicentibus nobis resolute a Majestate sua respondendum utrum filium Regis majestatis vellet vel non, pos[tea] de particularibus agendum, noluerit se super hoc declarare, sed dixerit velle prius de illis agere, quasi innuens ex eis pendere utrum illam vellet nec ne. Ad quod optime per D. Bathon. replicatum fuit, [qui] dixit quod particularia erant M^o sum notissima. Sed rex Gallorum, ut hoc evaderet, ostendit esse quod moderationem requirbat.

Quod pacem puto Regem hunc promptissime descensurum; si tamen sibi recuperatio filiorum pro pecuniis proponatur, ommissa Burgundia et aliis, in quibus jam videtur Cæsar non magnam vim fac[iturus]. Nec sum in ea opinione in qua esse videtur orator Pontificis et orator Venetus, videlicet quod rex Gallorum adhuc si honestis conditionibus filios recuperare posset, non sit cum Cæsare concordaturus, nisi contentis in liga impletis. Nam intimum est desiderium Gallorum de recuperandis filiis, et ideo non deerit, ut puto, color ad ligam in aliquo mitigandum. In eis enim, qui urgent Itali, solum est ducatus Mediolani quem vellent pro Sfortia. Hoc autem, ut opinor, putabunt posse evadere si Cæsar se difficilem reddiderit; præponent enim amissionem Hungaria (?) et vicinum a Turcis periculum, quod non potuit in consideratione haberi, quando liga facta fuit. Præponent etiam quod invenitur æquipollenter Ital. provideri videatur (sic) ex persona duce Borbonie, præsertim si provideatur quod investitura extendat se ad hoc, ad filios, &c., de quo hætenus, ut dicit hic Rex, actum non fuit, cum intendat solum ducem Borbonie Cæsar investire. Ad hoc etiam addent quod male contentus est dux Borbonie de Cæsare, unde magis poterunt confidere de eo Itali. Præponent etiam ipsos Italos alias de duce Borbonie contentos fuisse; quod etiam rex Gallorum nobis aperte dixit quod Pontificem, licet addiderit Δ^o nunc de hoc non contentari. Præponent etiam factum fuisse omnem conatum pro Sfortia, obtulisseque ad hoc, ut facilius Cæsar in eum consentiret, restituere omnia prout adhuc n offert. Quod si non possit Sfortia hoc obtinere, non debet propterea omnis Christianitas in manus Turcarum ire, nec timebit rex Gallorum ac Italos via æquipollentiam supplantari, cum non possit æquipollentiam fieri recuperationi filiorum. Et videatur excusatus aliquantulum rex Gallorum, si filios non recuperet, quantumvis magnum periculum expectare Turcarum.

A consideratione præmissorum alienum non videtur, quod pridie dictum est mihi a cardinale de Salviatis, fuisse, sc., superioribus diebus hic Hispanum quendam mercatorem, in Gallia habitantem, ad tractandum cum rege Gallorum nomine dum. Eleanore de pace, in quo licet vilis et parvæ auctoritatis esset tamen auditus fuit, nihilque de his que cum illo tractatum fuerat cum aliquo ex confederatis communicatum fuit. Dicitur autem postea in nihilum resolutum.† Quod ad Italos attinet, credo quod licet eorum oratores hic multum difficiles se reddant in consentiendo quod Mediolanum alteri quam Sfortia detur, tamen visa inclinatione regis Gallorum facile ad omnia cōdescendent.

Ubi autem pax ista tractari et concludi habeat puto a Cæsare pendere, cuius mentem puto hætenus non bene circa hoc intelligi, nec credo quod brevi spacio possit circa hoc veritas haberi nisi in sua curia; video enim cum istis satis urgens non solum scripsisse sed instetisse ut serenissimus Rex noster hanc provinciam suscipere et mediator pacis esse vellet.

Video ex opposito ab hoc Rege et etiam ab aliis confederatis, ut ex verbis Regis colligi potuit, et novissime etiam orator Pontificis confessus fuit instante Casare in Hispanias mandata pro pace missa fuisse; et hoc ut aptissime D. Bathon. ex ore Regis excerpsit, paucis abhinc diebus, cum dixerit ea adhuc in Caesaris curiam pervenire non potuisse. Quod etiam Pontificis orator affirmavit. Video etiam prout idem orator Pontificis uni, a quo ego habui dixit, licet dictis ipsius oratoris in hoc non multum tribuam, scripsisse non diu est, Casarem ad Papam contentum esse ut ibi hujusmodi tractatus fieret. Hoc autem in tot locis seminari potius videtur ex parte Casa[r]is ad] fraudem et intellectuum occupationem quam ad verum pacis desiderium tendere.

“ Quid autem sibi velit hæc recens mandatorum in Hispaniam missio, quam etiam per quendam camerarium Papæ, qui quatuor abhinc diebus in Hispaniam ivit, tam per Regem quam per alios iterata est, prudentissimo judicio D. v. R. considerandum remitto, præsertim si, prout dubito, nec ex parte Caesaris nec ex parte confederatorum Regi nostro et D. v. R. communicata fuerit; licet iste Rex hodie monitus a D. Bathoniensi quod hoc fieret non potuerat sine Rege nostro, dixerit se id ipsi Regi nostro significasse. Quid etiam significet, ita aride et in quantum generalia tam super deposito quam super pace nobiscum actum similiter consummatissimo judicio D. v. R. remitto. De deposito status Mediolani licet nobis responsum fuerit prout in communibus literis continetur, puto tamen etiam hoc a Gallo pendere quamvis ipse se circa hoc ad Italos referre videatur. Nec vereor quin innuente Gallo Itali consentiant; sed bene credo Gallum in hoc licet forte sub Italorum nomine dissensurum nisi certam viderint spem recuperationis filiorum; quia sperat, ut ipsemet dicit, ex illo bello quod adhuc nutrit, filiorum recuperationem. Scit autem quod si bellum illud cesset aliud aggredi opus est, in quo majori cum difficultate et majori sumptu Casari nocebitur. Prædicta licet pro majori parte ex his quæ hinc inde audiui collegerim, cupio tamen id solum apud D. v. R. ea scripsisse operari (sic) quod mandatis mihi factis obediverim.

“ Quod dictum est de investitura ducis Borbonia, si ad id deveniatur, dignetur D. v. R. considerare quod si præsupponamus eam ad filios non extendi, præter id quod difficultatem ingeret concordia; quia videbit Italia sibi non consultum; immo ut hic Rex et nonnulli alii dixerunt apparebit ducem Borbonia esse positum a Casare tanquam umbram. Etiam in magna parte destruit quod in privata mea instructione continetur, unde rogo D. v. R., dignetur me certum reddere si velit aliquid circa hoc agi cum Casare, casu quo sua Majestas sit omnino resoluta ut dux Borbonia sit dux Mediolani. Et si ad hoc deveniendum sit, forsitan non erit ab re ita se in ea re gerere ut cum viderit Italia relinquere suas ex hoc res minus securas reddi id quod sibi majoris securitatis accesserit istinc recognoscet.

“ Videtur Italis quod si Caesar instet ducatum Mediolani dari Borbonio, possit ei facile resisti; ex quo Gallus est contentus cum ad status suos restituere, nec videre quare, si Gallus Borbonio, pontifex Columpniensibus injuriam remittant, quare etiam idem erga Sfortium facturus non sit. i. From letters of the prothonotary Casale, 12 Dec., Venice.

Wrote on the 8th that the Pope's fear was lessened on account of the advance of the Viceroy towards Naples, and the Germans towards Milan. Still dreads that he may make some composition. Sir Gregory's letters will show what has happened at Rome.

In conversation with the Doge (hoc principe) about the Pope's fears, he told Casale that there was no reason for alarm, as matters seemed hopeful, and the Pope could not be compelled to take unfair offers; a truce, however, should be made for the purpose of wasting the Emperor's army in Italy; that he felt sure the Pope would do nothing except to satisfy the others; that the Venetians were in good spirits, having lately sent 40,000 ducats to the camp, and recruited their army; that they had intercepted two letters from George Salspruk, leader of the Germans, to Bourbon and to his son, saying that he could not keep his army longer without money; that he had pawned all his property, and was in extreme need, and had written thus several times without answer. The Venetians will send this news to the Pope to encourage him. The Germans are at Stella. Those at Milan will not come out to join the others without four months' pay, and they have not a farthing. Does not think matters are in so much danger as is thought; and if all do their duty like the Venetians, everything will be well.

ii. From letters of Sir Gregory, 5 Dec., Rome.

neither speak freely nor act openly. News came from Florence that Guicciardini had written to the Florentines to settle their affairs; and the Legate wrote thence that all were fleeing with their property, and that he intended to do the same. Card. Rod. Francesco and Giacomo Vittore begged the Pope to settle matters, as the only hope was in peace or truce. News has come today that the Germans are going towards Parma, and have already passed Sesin. The captain whom the Pope sent with Pinalosa to the Viceroy has returned with letters of credence, and says the Viceroy wishes first to know if the Pope has any authority from the other confederates for making peace, as his orders were to prosecute the war till a universal peace was concluded. The Viceroy has gone to Naples, Pompey Colonna to S. Germano, and Vespasian ad fundos ut dicitur quo se instruant.

The Venetians would be content with a long truce, which he thinks the Viceroy will not grant, because this army is for the Emperor's last attempt, and it could not be kept so long.

The Viceroy sent to ask the Pope whether he should come to Rome, or his Holiness send to Naples. Does not think the Viceroy will allow the Colonnas to be thus cast out, and the Pope says he would rather die than pardon them.

Toscanus and Lange wish the Pope to send a person of the long robe into France, and they urge him not to do anything till a resolution comes thence; but he will say nothing, except that he will not treat with the Imperialists except on extreme [necessity].

He is often told that now the Germans are departing Florence is safe. He, however, thinks they are marching by Pontremole toward Florence. He wishes neither to have any promise from the French king, nor to ask him anything, that he may not be bound to him. In short, he thinks of nothing but peace or truce, and, if possible, that the Venetians may join.

2705. CLERK and GHINUCCI to [WOLSEY].

Worcester arrived on Wednesday last. Went with him in the afternoon to the King. As touching Worcester's going into Spain, Francis offered to send a brief for him to take with him, saying that all their papers were ready for the matter to be treated in Spain. We reminded him that the contracting powers had written to the king of England to be a mediator, and were willing to send their commissions into England. He said at that time the commissions had not arrived in Spain. On my asking him when they were sent, he said when the Emperor was requested by the confederates to enter the league. I reminded him that the confederates had no such powers, and if any had been sent since without my master's knowledge, I did not know how he would take it. I urged that it was necessary to resort to mediation, by which more would be gained from the Emperor. He repeated very seriously his many obligations to the king of England, and his hopes that he would continue his friend; that he reckoned to obtain his children better cheap by the King's mediation than otherwise, and he desired Worcester to see if this could be agreed to. "As for the commissions, he could not deny b[ut] they were sent now very lately, but he could s[carce] have the patience to suffer me to make many persuasions [unto] him in the matter; and bade us hold our peace two or three [times], saying that it was no need to speak so much, or to ma[ke] so many reasons unto him in that matter." Finding it useless, we forbore, specially that it might not appear that the King's highness coveted this mediation.

They pretend to be very desirous that the King should have the handling of this matter, that both the French and the Emperor "do savour and smell how fain and prone ye be to join and conclude this matrimony with France," and consequently hinder the Emperor's purpose, and retard the delivery of the children. Besides, neither the Pope nor the Italians will consent that the duke of Bari be removed from Milan, and the dukedom be given to Bourbon, as was talked of in England; and Francis is of the same way of thinking. And from jealousy and fear of small assistance from England, they have blown in the French king's ears, and induced him to please the Emperor, and sent their commissions into Spain without consulting England. At first Francis opposed a plan suggested by Ghinucci for the duchy, afterwards he proposed it to the confederate ambassadors, who said they had no commission for depositing it in the King's hands, and they thought it would be strongly opposed by the present Duke, and induce him to go over to the Emperor. To avoid suspicion, agreed not to broach the question of marriage with my lady Princess, except incidentally. "And so, after long communication, my said lord of Worcester, making semblance to have fully declared his credence, and also semblance to take his leave for that season, I said, 'My Lord, ye have yet o[ne] matter to talk of more.' He said, 'What is that?' I said, 'Concerning my lady Princess and the perpetual peace.'" Then Worcester enlarged on the advantage of the marriage proposed by England, and asked for his resolution on that head. Francis generally repeated his obligations to England. There was nothing on earth he so much desired; but as "he must do his things with some colour," to give the Emperor some satisfaction, he would send some one to him to require Madame Eleanora, and if she were denied he would accept the other offer. We did not fail to urge the point with all arguments; and I added, if he did not have her "he might fortune to see her married in such place where he would be loth to see her." As he expects her for one of his children, he cares less to refuse her for himself. Could make no progress with the King and my Lady; and though she said that her son should not demand Madame Eleanora, but protest only, she has said that to have the children and be at rest and peace. If no other way would suffice, "the King her son should not stick to take the Emperor's sy[ster] and three such more, were they never so old or otherwise evil qualified. And the King showed us plainly that he would, rather than fail of his children, marry the Emperor's mule, not only his sister." It is no use offering to recover the children by war.

Details news of the proceedings in Italy. They have letters from Spain "that the Emperor maketh demonstration to be very angry with the dealing of don [Hugo] and the Colonyses against the Pope, and to purge that matter sendeth new ambassadors to Rome." Paulus de Aretio has been allowed to depart. Card. Colonna is deprived. The Pope complains that he has not received the 20,000 ducats per mensem as promised, and is in great perplexity. The King is hunting, and will not be here till Christmas. Poysy beside St. Germain, 12 Dec. Signed.

Received the King's letters to the Emperor and the king of Portugal, and Wolsey's, dated 6 Nov. Went to court, and told the Emperor that in consequence of the letters of Sir John Wallop, the King, fearing Christendom to be in great danger, could not fail to exhort all princes to use their efforts against the Turks; and as the Emperor is the highest prince in Christendom, he exhorted him to set an example which others should follow. The Emperor replied that the King would learn his good mind in this respect by the post, and that no new occasion had happened for this exhortation, as he had received letters from don Ferdinand on the 28th Oct., in which no other mention was made, except of the Turk being at Buda. Nevertheless, he would put himself in readiness. The King wins great praise for his zeal in this matter ; and, as one great and wise man here said unto me, his behaviour herein "maketh him dominatorem Christiani orbis, for that all princes now weigh as he weigheth." "To show your Grace what I think in these matters, I see . . . that these confederates, upon what ground I cannot tell, bu[t] by sending their commissioners all into Spain it should app[ear] that they be all contented to have the matter treated th[ere]."

Although the French king pretends he is sending into Spain only to demand Madame Eleanora, he doubtless intends to treat for peace. 2ndly, however obstinate the powers in Italy may be about Milan, they are expecting peace ; for if the French king is contented to restore Bourbon, marry Eleanora, pay the ransom for his children, and the Emperor does not demand Burgundy, being anxious for peace from fear of the Turk, they are in good train for it. If Francis pardons Bourbon, why should not the Emperor pardon the duke of Milan ? 3rdly, Francis evidently expects the restitution of his children, and consequently peace. For the payment required for the former is nothing in comparison with what it would cost to recover them by war. To relieve himself, therefore, he will offer a large sum to the Emperor. 4thly, to carry his point, he insists on certain conditions with the Italians, which are not likely to be arranged. I have told their orators here that they must consider the Frenchmen's nature, and how little inclined they would be to a new war, and unlikely to stick with them ; but for ought that he can say, "they remain s[till] in their good opinion. I pray God they be not deceived. I assure your Grace it is greatly [to be] feared ; for he that will marrye a moyll rather th[an] make war for his children, and take so moche off h[is] rights, and forbear so much off his own pleasure, rather [than] be deferred of his intent in that behalf, surely [it is] to be thought that he will not stick to borrow s[lights] of his neighbours."

If the French king "keep touch," no peace will be concluded. The Italians and the Emperor are obstinate. Then there will be need of mediation ; and Francis acknowledges that it would be better for the treaty to be made in England, for if it be made in Spain, it will lie with the Emperor to order himself as he has good or evil news. If the Emperor demands too large a sum, thinks they will never agree. This is my opinion touching Worcester's instructions :—though Francis may make proposals for my lady Princess, he is doubtless resolved to marry Madame Eleanora. My Lady assured me that Madame Eleanora "hath clearly changed her widow's apparel, and causeth herself to be called the French queen ; and she maketh [mention] of the children as of her sons." There is also a great suspicion here that through her means practices have been made in France by secret messengers. Is told by the Legate that when Francis was in Spain he seemed to have great pleasure in Madame Eleanora's company ; and to this day he speaks now and then very good and pleasant words of her. This is a sign that he sets more by her than he would have known to us. When, however, he compares her with my lady Princess, the latter "weighs down

Letters have come from France of the victory of the allied fleet over the Imperial on the 22nd ult. Of 32 ships, 16 have been taken or sunk. The rest fled, pursued by Pietro Navarra. The Germans have also been defeated "ad locum Petre," in the Veronese Alps. The remaining German infantry, frightened at the difficulties of the passage, and at this defeat, have retreated.

The Pope proceeds hotly in punishing the Colonnas. He has destroyed almost all their places, except one strong fort, which he hopes to take.

There have arrived at Rome 1,500 chosen hackbutmen, sent by Giovanni de Medici. They will suffice not merely for punishing the Colonnas, but also for attacking the expedition against Naples.

At the Imperial council at Spires there was a consultation made by the Emperor whether the donation by the emperor Constantine to pope Silvester was valid or not, and if by virtue thereof the Pope can call himself lord of Rome. The answer was Nay.

(Note in the margin.)—Written to Mons. de Langey from Almain, and from Italy by the card. du Bellay, his brother.

The Pope having ascertained this report to be true, fears that the Emperor, on pretence of visiting St. Peter and St. Paul, will assume the lordship of Rome. An Englishman has passed on his way to the Emperor, which has increased the Pope's alarm, who fears the king of England will agree with the Emperor, and that they both will attack him.

... ad . . . die vii. quod S. D.N. expectabat aliquod res[ponsum] a Rege, quod cum videretur nimis tardare et ex alia parte in . . . Presbyterum Pompeium et ceteros Columnenses cum magno exer[citu] in confinibus regni, existimareturque ipsos jam cepisse Cepe[ranum et] Pontemcorvum, claves, ut scitis, Campanias."

The Pope thought it was no good to wait longer without any provision, and determined to send the archbishop of Capua to Naples, as he wished to know the Viceroy's mind, and had no safe-conduct. He left . . . evening. This morning letters came from the general of St. Francis, saying, that he had found him in a disposition for peace, and that on the 8th he would come towards the Pope;—who immediately wrote to the Archbishop to return, if they met, but if he was near the end of his journey, to go on and say that his visit to the Viceroy was merely one of ceremony; meanwhile to find out what he had brought from the Emperor, but to make no mention of truce or p[ea]ce].

Cannot see what will happen. It is certain that if the Pope were stronger, he would be more promptly [helped] by his friends, "nundum vellet convenire cum e[vid]enter . . . Italia nunc collum supponat iugo Caesaris, ipsi dari orbis mo[n]di . . . quum monarchia, cum impediri non possit, etiamsi sua Sanctitas Ro[mam] relinquat, quam rem solam facere potest, si nolit convenire." He thinks it a less evil to remain here by any means he can than to leave his See, by which no good would come to others, and much harm to himself. One hope remains, that when the kings of England and France and Wolsey know in what great danger all Italy and the Pope are, since the arrival of the Germans and the fleet, they will be roused to give prompt and vigorous assistance. If so, we shall be preserved, or be able to accept less unjust terms. If nothing comes, the Pope will fall without hope of recovery, with the sole consolation of having done as much as he could, and persevered to the last. His Holiness has ordered 3,000 foot to be raised, as those in the neighbourhood do not seem strong enough to resist the great preparations made in the kingdom. Cardinal Triulzi is sent as legate to the army, and has started today.

In Lombardy, the Germans, leaving Parma on the right, make as if they were going to Pavia, but it is uncertain whether they will go there or the Spaniards join them to carry out the proposed expeditions. They have made a bridge over the Po at Stella, which will serve for either purpose. Piacenza is strong enough, but it is feared they may come to Tuscany, where there is no means of resisting. The Pope is in such want of money that he has pledged his paternal house in the Romagna. The misfortunes of this war have so lessened the Pope's authority that it is probable Florence will accept terms of the Imperialists without the Pope. Puts his trust in Wolsey, and desires his correspondent to commend him to his Grace.

" postea rediit Rev. Generalis S. Francisci et ne inclinationis ad pacem quam scribebat se inveni st, quod contentatur devenire ad suspensionem armorum per aliq " if money is given him (sc. the Viceroy) to pay his army, and the citadels of Ostia and Civita Vecchia, or Parma and Piacenza, as security for the observance of the truce. He offers, however, no security to the Pope, except his word. The terms are as unfair as if he were besieging the Pope in the castle; but the Pope's desire for peace is so great that if he can obtain a truce in no other way, he will be content to satisfy one of the Viceroy's demands for security of its observance. The payment of money seems to him too harsh, for if he had money he could spend it better in war, but if he is not helped by his friends he must accept any terms. Thinks these demands may be moderated. The Pope does not despair of obtaining this truce with greater profit to himself, if the enemy, while talking of the treaty, do not prepare for war, or if he has any means of making preparations for his defence, "quemadmodum haberet istic. Intellecto adventu certo Germ[anorum et] classis, fuisset facta resolutio nobis subveniendi, ne pe cum hac spe impetum hostium, quamdiu poterimus, sustinebi[mus]."

P.S.—Thinks there will be nothing to displease Wolsey in the truce, "nisi im conditionum, cum quibus vereor etiam, ne illas cogamur accipere cu R^{ma} D. sua inducias in ceteris approbaverit, et minimam [recuperandi f]liorum spem habeamus." Desires to be commended to Wolsey.

20 Dec. The terms proposed by the General, in the Viceroy's name, seem severe, but the Pope is more displeased with what the archbishop of Capua writes from Naples on the 15th. "Siquidem in propositione Generalis vide saltem Sanctitas sua se cum aliqua turpitudine et damno suo lu[erari] tempus et commoditatem aliis confederatis, in quo possent mat tractare pacem universalem," which, without doubt, would have followed, [if,] as was the Pope's intention, a universal suspension of arms had been concluded for six months. The signory of Venice consented to it, and it was hoped that the French king would do the same. "Nunc scir archiepiscopus contentari quidem viceregem convenire, sed cum sua Sanctitate eo Illa tamen etiam sibi dante magnam summam pecuniarum et in pignu[s] manendi in pace fienda aut duas quas postulabat etiam pro induciis, etsi Veneti volent pacem, dabit cum eisdem conditionibus, viz. pignoris et p[ecunia]."

Otherwise, he (the Viceroy) says, he will not lay down his arms, and throw away the opportunity fortune has given him. The Archbishop enlarges on the dangers to which the Pope will be exposed if he prosecutes the war, or overlooks his own affairs for the sake of others. His Holiness is in a worse strait than he was a few days ago; for he sees that he must do one of three things,—either protect himself for some time, which he cannot do of himself, and does not expect his friends to help him; or flee, by which the possessions of Rome and the States of the Church would be left to the Emperor, who would use them to subdue the rest of Italy, and then France, so as gradually to obtain the sole power, which he covets; or, make a treaty, which would be most disagreeable to him, not on account of his own loss and disgrace in accepting such unjust terms, and remaining in slavery at the Emperor's discretion, but because if he alone made peace the war would still continue amongst the others, and he would despair of an universal peace. In these difficulties he causes delays, that he may be free as long as possible, nor come to such unjust terms "nisi quantum [nece]ssit[us] coegerit." His enemies do not desist from preparing to attack him, in consequence of these negotiations. The Colonnese have made a camp, and taken Ceprano (Ceperanum) and Pontecorvo, and other lands.

Vitelli proposed to bring back our forces to two or three [places] nearer to Rome. In Lombardy the Germans have given us time to fortify . . . Parma and Piacentia, and other towns, as they have gone towards Pavia. It is thought the Spaniards will cross the Po to join them for some new expedition.

On the 13th the Germans were still at Borgo S. Donini. The marquis of Saluzzo, who was about to cross the Po to aid the Papal States, had moved his camp from Treni.

Considering the danger and want, it will not be wonderful if they are driven to some dishonorable treaty, but [the Pope] waits to see what comes from England or France, when the arrival of the Germans and the fleet is known. "Galli maxime qu [r]uinam ita imminentem eorum capiti quemadmodum] non sunt tamen adeo procul quod ipsi etiam non sint opprimendi" The Pope has not only exerted himself beyond his power, but has a thousand times protested to his friends, so that none of them have any excuse. The arrival of Renzo and the fleet is to our necessity as a fly to an elephant. Sends salutations to Wolsey, their only hope.

180.
R. M.

As soon as the archbishop (of Capua) had departed, news came that Renzo had come with 20,000 cr., and that the fleet was bringing 25,000 cr. and 3,000 foot from France. The lanzknechts have gone to join those in Pavia, leaving Florence. The Florentines are collecting money. Count Filippino writes from Genoa that the city suffers from famine. The Pope has determined that the galleys here shall go thither and try an attack in company with the French fleet.

D. Albertus (Carpi) and D. Toscanus went to the Pope to dissuade him from acceding to the Viceroy's proposed terms, which were, a truce for six months, and the Pope to deliver Parma, Piacenza or Ostia, and Civita Vecchia, and a sum of money;—which last, however, the General said, might be dispensed with. The Viceroy also offered a dumb son of his as a hostage to the Pope. His Holiness spoke of his necessity, and the impossibility of resisting the Viceroy's wishes, and thought it the greatest good fortune to have any truce. D. Albertus showed him that the surrender of Parma and Piacenza would give assured victory to the Viceroy, who, leaving the expedition of Bologna and Modena to the duke of Ferrara, would attack Florence and Rome without resistance; he would distribute his troops among the towns, and extort great sums of money; and that if the Pope did not accede to these terms, the Imperial army would with difficulty get through the winter. The Pope, however, could not be moved. They then asked him to gain time by negotiations, but he showed them letters from the Florentines, saying that if he did not agree they would.

Vitelli writes that they will have to retreat to Rome if the Colonnese attack them with a strong army.

Sir Gregory told the Pope that as he could not continue the war, nothing was better than peace, but he must beware of accepting a truce too much to the Viceroy's advantage, for that would make peace more difficult, and the victory of the Imperialists more certain. He thinks the Pope will take the truce, if he can, without the payment of money.

The reply of the Archbishop is waited for.

A papal nuncio, who has just come from Naples, says that the Viceroy said to him, "Pontifex privavit Columnnam, et Columnna privabit Pontificem."

All the councillors there cry out against the Pope.

Card. Colonna has cited the Pope to appear at Spire, by virtue of a bull of Julius.

"Jam sunt tres dies, ex quo dum Pontifex m esset, illud ingressus fuit Aguilera Cæsareu agens et secretarius Peres." He read publicly the Emperor's answers to the brief sent by the Pope when he first entered the treaty, and asked his Holiness to grant a council; if he refused, the Cardinals would be asked to do so, and to summon the Pope. The Pope will answer the Emperor's letter, but will not create cardinals, probably because the French king and other princes would suppose he had made much money thereby, and be more careless of helping him.

The 20,000 cr. have not come. The French chancellor writes to D. Albertus about the tenth, saying nothing of the Germans. These letters have not been shown to the Pope. The Venetians have not sent the duke of Urbino against the Germans, nor has the marquis of Saluzzo gone towards Piacenza.

ii. Extract from letters of Sir Gregory [Casale], dated Dec. 20.

The Pope, on hearing from the archbishop of Capua the resolution of the Viceroy, sent for D. Albertus and Sir Gregory. Both thought very ill of it, the Viceroy evidently wishing to put the Pope off his guard. D. Albertus advised the Pope to recall suddenly the archbishop of Capua. The Pope proposed two courses,—to flee, or to make a treaty,—both of which seemed unadvisable. Defence seemed the best way, and money would be obtained by the creation of cardinals. Although his Holiness says that cardinals must not be created for money, still it is thought he will come to it at last.

"Pontifex in hoc se resolvit ut se def[endat] quousque poterit et quousque vicerex rescrips[erit] ad literas Generalis qui, ut ait, certus de Cæs[aris] animo, uberrime ad viceregem scripsit."

Almost all the cardinals desire peace. The General warns the Viceroy not to drive the Pope to despair. Fears the Viceroy will delude both the Pope and the General. Philip Strozzi and the other Florentines give the same advice as the archbishop of Capua.

Bourbon has sent his almoner to tell the Pope that the lanzknechts will not be used to his injury, and to persuade him to peace. He writes also to the Viceroy to ask him to make truce with the Pope, or send 20,000 cr. to pay the lanzknechts.

The Pope complains that after all his calamities he has received nothing but words from the French king.

As to the suspension of arms and the contribution proposed by the general of St. Francis, . . . answered that nothing had been said about the suspension of arms unless peace was first made with the Pope and the other Italian potentates. The General, therefore, does not seem to be speaking the truth. When peace has been concluded with the Pope, in order that a universal peace may ensue, a suspension of arms can be negotiated with other potentates. There will then be time to contribute and pay money to maintain the Imperial army. As to the securities which the Archbishop desired, it was answered that the General was fully instructed as to the mind of the Viceroy and don Hugo. The Viceroy wishes to have, as security during the suspension of arms, Parma and Piacenza from the Pope, and Brescia from the Venetians. To the Archbishop's request as to what conditions and contributions would be exacted if the Pope resolved on peace, it was answered that the Emperor desired a firm peace, and the General had full instructions. The Viceroy will not refuse to come to Rome.

2717. The ELECTORS OF GERMANY to HENRY VIII.

Some of the electors left today, as the business of the diet is nearly finished; and the remainder were on the point of leaving, when the King's letters dated Greenwich, 31 Oct., were given to them. Did not easily understand them, but are glad to see his desire to assist Christendom in its present distress, and to resist the Turk. Will do what they can for the same object, and have deliberated thereon in the present diet. It has been determined to hold another diet at Ratisbon, on 1 April next, to arrange an attack on the Turks. Easlingæ, 20 Dec. 1526.

Received his letter by Wallop on Nov. 30. Has sent one of his servants, named John Geylkyrch, with the King's letter to the archbishop of Mayence. Has sent the letter to George duke of Saxony, by Gerart of Campon, his secretary. The Archbishop is at present at Eslung, whither Wallop is gone. The duke of Westphalia and the archbishop of Cologne have desired him to bring Wallop to make merry, and to hunt wild boars at Bruel Castle. Ten boars were taken, of which his Grace gave Wallop and Ryngk two of the best. The Archbishop showed great cheer to Pace at the election of the emperor Charles. He commended the King's intention to help them against the Turks, saying that he was worthy to be elected king of the Romans. The king of Bohemia, the archduke Ferdinand, sends to the King his treasurer, Salamanco, count of Urdenburge. Hears that the Archduke will be made king of Hungary. It is not likely the Turks will stop in Hungary, for the great Soff gives them enough to do.

2719. The LUTHERANS IN GERMANY.

Vit. B. xxi. 15.

R. M.

The meeting at Moynforth, "in Porcorum Valle," was put off till the present week. "Convenerem cum duobus electoribus, Maguntino et Palatino", lantgravius Hassin* et dux Saxonie primogenitus Jo[hannia] Electoris cujus pollex dextri pedis amputatus fuit, quia gangrena correptus erat, quæ postmodum versa erat in facietum seu syderationem" (paralysis). Many say he is already dead. The terms offered to the Lutherans are,—to restore the goods of the ecclesiastics; to allow Catholic preachers to preach publicly; and to forbid the future marriage of ecclesiastics, those now married to remain until a future council, which the writer thinks will take place at the Greek calends. Does not expect they will admit the first condition. At the close of this meeting they will all come hither to swear fealty to the king of the Romans.

There is no certain news of the Turk's arrival. The Emperor is arranging everything both here and in Italy. Many German captains are assembled here, and men will be easily raised in a month, especially if there is ready money. The Emperor has determined to march straight against the Turk himself, with 100,000 foot and 15,000 horse, including the 40,000 foot and 8,000 horse promised him by the German princes at the diet of Augsburg, as soon as the Turk attacked the limits of the empire. The rest he will provide from the ransom of the French king. Fears the Turk may shut himself up in some strong place, and with his cavalry cut off the supplies of his besiegers.

* lantgravius Hassin.] In the MS. the reading is "(ant gravius Hassin)" within parentheses,—evidently a copyist's error.

The Italian coast is so well fortified that his fleet could only land in shallow and dangerous places, and could make no great incursions. The marquis of Guasto, who has now set out for Romagna, and will go thence to Tronto, would be ready to attack them. Andrea Auria (Doria) is also ready with his fleet. Letters of the 12th ult. state that a Turkish ambassador had arrived at Venice; but he can say nothing further, for his last letters from Venice are dated the 11th. "Pedites (sic) existimatur permutationem Coreyræ insulæ aut alicujus portus neutorum (sic, q. Venetorum ?) in alium quendam locum in Græcia longe meliorem." Does not think the Venetians will allow this, as it would give the Turk facilities for attacking Italy and even themselves. Mons. de Bauray is sent to Rome, Mons. de Prat to Venice, and perhaps Francis Riceus to Poland. Mons. de Balançon starts today for France, and Mons. Monfauconet, a noble of Savoy, to the king [of England], to ask for help against the Turks, or at least to request the King not to hinder the Emperor by war. Erasmus Auria left for Genoa six days ago. John Rens, chief treasurer for the war, will go hither tomorrow. 150,000 ducats have been sent thither from hence, and 100,000 from Spain. The Pope continually urges the French king to make an expedition to Africa or Syria.

2721. JOHN HACKETT to [WOLSEY].

Galba, i. 37.

B. M.

Hoghestrat told him yesterday that my Lady had heard from Italy that the Viceroy had arrived at Naples, that the marquis of Mantua and the duke of Ferrara had declared for the Emperor, and all his affairs in Italy go before the wind; that the king of Portugal sends five ships to serve him, and that his army in Italy is 60,000 men. Thinks a part only is true, which Wolsey will know better than he. A gentleman told him that [Wolsey] declared to the provost of Cassel some articles touching the sequestration of the duchy of Milan and the "axion" of Burgundy, and that one of the lords said that if the Emperor was prisoner himself, the fulfilling of these articles was enough to make peace, and bring him to liberty.

As to the books, the lords of Antwerp came to the court, and showed the council that Hacket was urging the burning of the books, and the punishment of the printers, and that they have taken in part the examination of the said imp[rinters]; but as the affair touches life, they will not judge by the judgment of another man without perfect knowledge of the reasons, and they therefore desire to have the said [books] translated into Latin or Dutch, that they may understand the matter;—to which the [Lords] of the Privy Council would lightly consent. Answered that it was not convenient to permit such translations to be made here, for he would suspect those who would meddle in the same. They said they ought not to judge without knowing the foundation of the cause. Answered that the King's letters were sufficient for that, and for the condemnation of all writings condemned in England. They said that if the King had sent a copy of every book that had been burnt, they would do like justice on them. One said that every country has its own laws, and the judges here ought to know upon what they shall pass sentence, as well as those in England do. After many arguments, promised to write to Wolsey to send sufficient certification, with two or three of the condemned books, which he supposes Wolsey has kept for such a purpose. The Lords desired him to ask for a translation of them. It is necessary that justice should be administered before the end of this Barrow market, but the first execution must be done in Antwerp, the fountain of such things. Sends this letter by a special post. Sends one of the arrested books. Wolsey had better send one of each sort hither. Mechlyn, 22 Dec. 1526. Signed.

24 Dec. 2723. CLERK to [WOLSEY].

Cal. D. ix. 103.

B. M.

Mentioned in his last that the Pope was in great perplexity from the reinforcements the Emperor was sending by sea and land to Italy, and had written hither to the French king very urgently. The matter was little thought of at the time, as it was believed the Emperor's army by sea had been destroyed; but, according to later letters, the lanceknights sent by the Archduke had crossed the Po at Hostia, and were far on the road to Florence; the duke of Ferrara had declared for the Emperor, and given them one month's wages, and lent them artillery, and had set forward himself to Modena; the viceroy of Naples had landed at St. Stephen's near Sienna, on the other side of Florence, with 16 galleys and 5,000 foot; and six galleys and 1,500 lanceknights had landed at Gaeta. The Pope had sent the abp. of Capua to the Viceroy "to treat upon a [suspension of] armeur, but there could be no remedy." Jhoannino de Medicis had been wounded by a gun "and con[strained] to cut off his leg: he could not abide the pain, and [so] died of the spasm." The marquis of Saluces, the French king's chief captain, was pursuing the lanceknights into Tuscany.

Francis has been hunting about thirty miles hence for the last ten days. The Papal and Venetian ambassadors have been with my Lady, urging that the King should go to Italy in person, or at least to Lyons. They were put off for two days, but still await the King's return. News is come from Venice that a friar had been sent by the Emperor to the Pope with certain articles; viz., as to France, the Emperor was willing to leave his hold in Burgoyne, and restore the French king's children if Francis would pay the King what he owes him, and 2,000,000 [ducats for] Madame Eleanor, rebating 500,000 ducats of the same for her dote. As to Milan, he would let the Duke remain if he have not failed; if he have, he will have Bourbon duke; the Pope to be judge. For his coming to the crown imperial he is willing to be limited to 5,000 men. For all this the Viceroy will grant the Pope no truce, and it is thought the sending of the friar was a ruse to conclude the articles only if the Viceroy and lanceknights had not come to Italy in time.

The court and ambassadors here are in great perplexity about these affairs, and "look hourly for tidings which cannot be gay." Either the Pope has by this time accepted the Viceroy's terms, or Florence is in great danger of being sacked and his Holiness fled to Venice. [Andrea] Doria and the galleys that went to Hostia will probably be of service to him in that. Poissi, 24 Dec. Signed.

2726. PROPOSALS for a TREATY between ENGLAND and FRANCE.

R. O.

The king of England desires a perpetual peace between France and England, and to that end will satisfy the French king and his successors for all the rights he claims or possesses in France. He will give his only daughter in marriage, with a suitable dower and jewels, to the French king, making her heir to the throne, if there are no sons born subsequently. In event of her not coming to the throne, he will give her as much as the Emperor had with his wife, or as much as was promised to the Emperor as her portion in the late treaty. The French king to bind himself and his successors to pay a certain amount of salt and money, &c. annually to Henry and his successors, through the French king and his daughter, but it is not to be considered as a tribute. In any case security will be given for the amount of the Princess's dowry. If there are no children to succeed from this marriage this agreement to be void, and all treaties and conventions to be as they are now. In all cases the present treaty is to remain. Henry will enter into a treaty with the French king for the restoration, by force or otherwise, of his children detained by the Emperor as hostages.

2727. [GHINUCCI to WOLSEY.]

Vesp. C. III.
303.

B. M.

St. P. VI. 552.

Has not written since the 12th, for want of an opportunity. The bishop of Bath will write what has since occurred. Excuses his remaining here so long. Has solicited his despatch daily, and when the Queen Mother took ill, the bishop of Bath was informed they were awaiting Fitzwilliam's arrival to send off Ghinucci. On his arrival they were all three with her, and she said his despatch was ready at last, but recommended that he should wait the return of her son next day, who might have news from Italy. This was yesterday (externa die, q. hesternus?). Hears now that the King will not be here till Sunday, so that they cannot have audience till Monday, and even if despatched that day he could not begin his journey before Christmas Day. Is much annoyed at being thus put off, but without a passport he cannot go to Spain. Would have gone many days ago if he could have got one, leaving some one to come after him with the rest of his charge, but was warned by the bishop of Bath that if he did, the other things would be put off, or given up altogether. My Lady said yesterday to Clerk and Fitzwilliam apart, that Henry had told Joachim that Ghinucci was not to go so soon, and she looked for letters from England while they were waiting for the King her son. This is very likely, seeing that when Fitzwilliam took his leave the King was under the impression Ghinucci had already left the French court. The French have professed hitherto to think that the Turk, even if he has returned to Constantinople, has left 100,000 men in Hungary, and will return in spring to attack Austria or Italy; but news has come from Rome, which they have concealed for some days, showing there is no fear of that. The success of the Emperor makes the French lukewarm.

Wolsey will see how the French delay his departure. Does not pretend to fathom their reasons, but thinks they expect some advantage from it; otherwise they would not have risked the King and Wolsey's displeasure, having now delayed him 20 days. By his last letters Wolsey will see the reason why the lady Eleanor now visits the Emperor rather than before. Gives his speculations on the subject. Will hear about the marriage from Clerk and Fitzwilliam. Is of the same opinion as before, except, perhaps, that the king of France, seeing the Emperor lord of Italy, and, for other reasons, entertaining little hope of arranging with him, may be compelled to have recourse to the King, when any little suggestion will suffice to promote the marriage. Cannot understand the intentions of Francis in allowing the Emperor to do what he likes in Italy, except it is that he thinks to recover his sons by some other means than by war.—Alarm of the pontifical and Venetian ambassadors.

P.S.—Since writing the above, they have been with Francis. The bishop of Bath reports their conference about the marriage. Remains of the same opinion as before. Thinks Wolsey will have an answer in eight days. Robertet has promised faithfully to despatch the writer tonight or tomorrow, though he says Francis would have liked him to wait for the Emperor's answer to his proposals. Poisi, 24 Dec. 1526.

P.S.—Wolsey will understand from the bishop of Bath's letters about a monk sent by the Emperor to the Pope, with such offers that the Pope and Italy can hardly hope for better things through any other channel. Some think the Turk's invasion of Hungary has had this effect; others believe it is an artifice, as the Emperor is sending forces by land and sea to Italy. Thinks Christian princes will not fail to unite against the Turk, who is now dangerous both to Sicily and Italy. Poisi, 24 Dec. 1526.*

2728. CLERK and FITZWILLIAM to [WOLSEY].

I, Fitzwilliam, arrived at Poysye on Wednesday last. The King was away. Visited my Lady with Worcester, who "is made privy no further than the first [and] the second degree." On their starting Morette called. Went to my Lady with a large company. Delivered the King and Wolsey's letters. Fitzwilliam made the King's and Wolsey's recommendations, not omitting thanks for the pictures or expressions of the interest the King felt in his brother's welfare. He then proceeded to say that he had been sent to know how the King would dispose of himself in marriage, in which his master desired nothing except the honor and profit of her son. She answered that when she saw Fitzwilliam she greatly rejoiced, and could not but remember "the good and the golden world," for Fitzwilliam had brought her the late peace, and has been a great instrument for her son's deliverance. As to the point required, she could give no answer, for her son was forth hunting, not intending to return, but hearing of Fitzwilliam's arrival, he had begun his journey homewards. Could get no more from her. Then they talked of the affairs of Italy, and the position of the Pope and the duke of Ferrara,—that the former had sent the archbishop of Capua to the Viceroy. She thought that the enterprise in Italy would be the Emperor's ruin. As they stand so much on Italian affairs, proceeded no further at this audience. When they urged the despatch of Worcester, she said she thought as the case stood the King would not send him yet to Spain, making as if your Grace's mind had been changed, and asked whether he had received any letters, saying they had heard from Joachim that it was so, and Worcester had better tarry a day or two. He thinks this is some subtlety of Joachim's. Wish for instructions, and whether in the last degree of their instructions "when we shall offer my lady Princess absolutely," ye mean to concur with the French king in making war on the Emperor. Poysye, 22 Dec.

P.S.—The King returned on Saturday. He sent word that if they liked to come on Sunday he would wait dinner. Fared right well with the Admiral, and were conducted by him to the King's chambers, who had not yet risen from dinner. The King told us he did not consider himself bound by the treaty of Madrid;—that when he came to treat with the Emperor, having no more assistance than he now has, the latter would insist on his marrying Madame Eleanora. On Fitzwilliam saying he had been sent by his master to speak plainly "the bottom of his heart and mind," he said, "he would gladly hear, and that round, plain and open language was a language that pleased him best of all." Fitzwilliam told him that he had been sent to offer him the princess Mary on easy term; if that proposal were accepted, the King would join him and his confederates, and that the Emperor, through dread of them, would deliver the children on more easy terms than by his marriage with Eleanora. He received this announcement "with a glad and a very merry countenance," and after many protestations of his love and worship for the King "in the best couched language that ever he heard spoken," referred us to my Lady with these words: "If this matter be ever concluded, I will plainly send the Emperor word that I will none of his sister."

On entering her presence my Lady told us she was glad to hear of her son's conformity; that he had been a long time anxious to marry the Princess, both for her "manifold virtues and other gay qualities," which, we assure your Grace, "here be not unknown." Then Fitzwilliam rehearsed his instructions "of the first degree." She said "she was glad we spoke no more of Boleyn (Boulogne). We said that your Grace [being] advertised of her pleasure, and what difficulty should be in that matter," had with great labor and study induced the King to accept lower conditions, hoping there would be no obstacle, and that she would concur. She promised she would not remain neutral, but debate the matter with her son, and let us know. On asking what were our powers, we told her, None; but that as soon as she had arranged the matter with her son some qualified person of the long robe must be employed. She desired it might be kept secret. We told her that she and her son were so conformable that we thought we might write to the King as if the matter were concluded. "She, smiling, bade us write, but she said not what," and so took her leave. Your Grace sees many vehement tokens that this matter will take effect, "if the faults be not in yourself." Sum up their arguments for so thinking under five heads.

"On the other side, to be plain with your Grace, for all this we think it hard to say what they now think, and what they will do." They are very anxious for the return of the children, and will take the shorter and easier way; and the Emperor, who is now desirous of their unity, will not be exacting. If, however, they intend to make war, Francis must send help to his confederates, who are in total ruin. They do this very slowly. We shall stick in "the first degree," and not come to the last till we know your Grace's pleasure. Poysye, Christmas Day, 25 Dec.

2729. The DUKE OF RICHMOND'S COUNCIL to WOLSEY.

My lord of Richmond is in good health, and desires continuance of Wolsey's favor. Received on Friday a letter from Wolsey, dated at Hampton Court, 29 Nov., directing them how to treat the Earl of Northumberland and his causes. Will endeavor to do so lovingly and with good will, as they have done hitherto. Deferred the sending up of James Dralonde with the examination of the witnesses touching his indictment as principal, and that of the said Earl as accessory, until Wolsey sent down the writ of certiorari to the sheriff, which being now had, there will be no more delay. Will observe his instructions about the indictment of Henry Savell. Thos. Strey, clerk of the assizes, will be at London in Hilary Term with the original records. Enclose a letter from the earl of Cumberland concerning riots lately committed in Carlisle. Have summoned the offenders to appear before them. Wish to know what punishment to inflict. Send copy of an indenture tripartite, showing what good order the earl of Westmoreland has taken with the gentlemen of Northumberland for keeping a watch on the Borders. This is "the worst peace observed that ever was seen in our time, which annoyed the Borders worse than all the wars did before," for they take prisoners continually, and compel them to pay ransoms in spite of the peace. The Earl desires to have the appointment and dismissal of officers for the keeping of Berwick, and the farm of the tithes in Bamboroughshire, which lord Darcy and Sir Anthony Utright held before him. He has petitioned the Council for the liberation of the gentlemen of Northumberland, whom they have here in prison, that they may be the more ready to do the King service when called on. Sheriff Hutton, Christmas Day, 25 Dec.

2730. WILL. LORD SANDYS to WOLSEY.

Ever since landing we have been busy, in pursuance of the King's commands, viewing this town, which is marvellous sore decayed. Has not yet been at Guianes, as it is thought necessary to finish this town first. No news worth writing. Most of the commonalty of Flanders would have peace, and the gentlemen will none. Vendôme is coming to Picardy to protect the Border with 400 men. It was said Sandys had come over with 4,000 men of war, and the capt. of Boulogne sent to him to know the truth. Informed him that he came over at his own request to look upon his charge. Sends a New Year's gift. Calais, 28 Dec. Signed.

Sent news on 13 Dec., with his brother's letter. Details the affairs in Italy, and the disputes between the Spanish and German troops, who plunder in all directions. On the 20th received the King's letters for the Doge, who greatly laments the present calamities. He would, however, be glad if those who, like the King, profess themselves friendly to the cause, would show something more than good wishes; and if they had thought that they should have been so slenderly helped by the King, they would never have been induced to have taken their present course. I urged him to have confidence in the King. Has written of the affairs of the Turk. Gives his advice as to what should be done. Would have been glad if 50,000 ducats had been sent to the Pope. Gives reasons for this. Hears by letters written to the Doge on the 23rd, that the Auditor (Ghinucci) has been sent into Spain.

The French are not aware of the perilous state of Italy. Sends letters received by him at Rome. Has written to the Pope to keep him steady, and to assure him that Venice will not forsake him. He has been told that all this ruin springs from this agreement [qu. with the Viceroy?]. If he could be induced to put it off for 15 or 20 days, until intelligence came from France, there might be some hope. I am very much afraid of the Pope's cowardice (vilem animum), especially if he gives up Parma and Piacenza to the Viceroy. We have some hope of his non-compliance, in consequence of the nefarious demands of the Viceroy. This day, on the 27th, I learned by letters from Florence that the Florentines are hopeful. Two ships, bringing supplies to Genoa, were driven off by Renzo. Caesar Feramosca is visiting the Pope. The number of Venetian soldiers who have crossed the Po amounts to 10,000 foot and 300 horse. Venice, 28 Dec. 1526.

P.S.—Sends his letters sometimes by the Venetian post, and sometimes to the bishop of Bath. Asks to be excused if they are delayed.

The Datary said that there were many evils in the letters of the archbishop of Capua, and afterwards he showed them secretly to count Albert (Carpì), who told Gregory [Casale] the substance of them; sc. that the Pope should by all means accept the conditions offered to him, otherwise actum est. The Viceroy, who says he has victory in his hands, affirms that he made these offers out of respect to the Pope, and advised him to put no hope in the League, on account of the ambition of Wolsey. The Archbishop said publicly that Wolsey cared only that peace should be made by his means, and therefore urged on the French king, the Venetians and the Pope, and the rest of the Italians, in order that the Emperor might be induced to make peace, which he hoped to negotiate, as his king was not in the League.

The Pope's army was near [Naples], consisting of 10,000 foot, well supplied. A few days ago the "[Colon]nenses" went to Bauch, a castle belonging to the Pope, and were driven back with great loss.

The Colonnas had got 200 foot into a priest's house in Anag[ni] by treachery, but John Leoni, a Papal captain, discovered them; a fight ensued, and the rest of the Colonnese gained an entrance. Count Tole . . . whose forces were in the higher part of the city, came to defend the gate, and the Colonnese were put to flight. Leoni meanwhile killed all those in the priest's house. No news about the treaty, for the demands of the Viceroy are most unjust. The General went today to Gaeta, and hopes to soften his demands. The general opinion is that the arrangement will take place, but the Pope and Datary say that it would be better to lose everything than to submit to such conditions. Renzo urges the Pope to an expedition against Naples, but it is not yet settled.

The Pope cannot be induced to create cardinals. The French king has not yet sent word what he means to do, though he has obtained the tenths, and all else that he asked. The Pope and others assert that the soldiers' wages were paid out of money sent by the King, and that the disbanding of the army was thus prevented.

2734. DR. JOHN LONDON to MR. LARKE.

"Right honorable and my singular good Master Larke, I have me humbly commended unto your good mastership as your own bounden orator during my life. And forasmuch as now a good season I did not write unto you how my lord's Grace most meritorious works do go forward daily, winter and summer, notably in sundry places by the great politic diligence of Mr. Dean, Mr. Towneley, Mr. Lovyns, Mr. Redman, and Mr. Coke, with supervision of true overseers, rising towards the most goodliest structure of a college, I shall briefly express unto you in what forwardness that magnificent work prospereth. First, all the lodgings in the west side be fully finished, save only batteling of the stone work, and the great tower over the gate is as high erect as the said lodgings. Towards the street the King's grace and my lord Cardinal's arms in three sundry works most curiously be set over the middle of that gate, and my lord's Grace's arms goodly set out with gold and color. All those lodgings be thoroughly covered with lead.

"Inwardly the carpenters have done right good diligence to prepare the doors, windows, partitions and other necessities, so that almost nothing shall let but that my Lord's scholars shall at his Grace's pleasure inhabit the same. At the south end there is a great tower, which within four foot is erect as high as the other lodgings. And so upon the south side the chambers which be towards the hall be almost come to bear the floors of the upper lodging. And the foundation of the hall is in most places five or six foot high. The foundation of the church in the north side is equal with the ground, and in like manner the foundations of lodgings of the east side be upon the outer side erect unto the old church door, and in the inner side high as far as is required.

"Over this, almost all the foundations of the cloister be as high as the ground. The kitchen is finished, save only the looser; and all this Christmas the Dean and Canons had all their victuals prepared there. Behind the kitchen southward be goodly larder houses, pastry houses, lodgings for common servants, slaughter and fish houses, stables, with such other necessary buildings, substantially and goodly done in such manner as no two of the best colleges in Oxford have rooms so goodly and convenient. And these places be all cleansed with water, as oft as need shall require, currently passing thorough them all, either by the common stream or else by policy. For all the water which shall at rains issue into my lord's Grace college is by a goodly vault conveyed into the sink of the kitchen; and that sink is in every place so large that if any stopping should chance, a man may go in to purge the stoppage, and is as well and substantially wrought as any part of my Lord's college.

"And where as the old lodgings of Pockwaters In do stonde, now be made houses for masons to work in. Would God there were so many masons as there is stuff ready carried requiring their work! This last summer stone come in from Burford, Teynton, Barendon, and Hedyngton, sufficient to find many more masons than yet be here until Midsummer. And as good provision is made for lime and all other necessities. The carpenters in their timber work be as far forward as their work requireth, and every part of their and the masons' work is as clean wrought as ever we saw any done in any place, and every thing in like substantial manner done as my Lord's gracious purpose is to have his meritorious act perpetually to endure. And as we all of my Lord's University be bound perpetually to pray for my lord's Grace for his most notable benefit and excellent ornament done to his University, so in like manner we be bound to pray for Mr. Dean, Mr. Towneley and all the other overseers and masters of works, by whose providence and faithful diligence this meritorious work is like within few years to be finished, to my lord's Grace immortal honor, I beseech Almighty God prosper the same.

"And if I should express unto you how the live matters of this college in every part and in all degrees do prosper, a great deal of paper could not contain the expressing of the same. I think Almighty God is not more duly, more devoutly nor better served in any church in Christendom, both working day and holyday, and in their learning they be the flower of my Lord's University, they be lights to all other places, and it cannot be but they do prosper in virtue where God is so truly served, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost among every one of them be so abundantly relucet. In the ordering of their lands, all other places may and do take example of them. If you were a continual dweller in Oxford, and did take a watchful regard unto that young college, but yesterday in manner begun, ye should not think but it were a very old foundation, established in everything as though it had be founded two hundred years past, only the buildings not yet finished sheweth it to be a new foundation. I heartily beseech Almighty God that my lord's Grace may live many years after the final performance of his most honorable edification to do many mo great and meritorious acts to honor of God, increase of Christian faith and perpetuation of his noble fame. I humbly beseech your good mastership to pardon my rude writing; and as you did to my great comfort obtain for me my lord's Grace favor, so I humbly beseech you I may have your good word unto my lord's Grace for the continuation of the same. And thus Almighty Jesus long to his blessed pleasure preserve your good mastership. Oxon. die S'cti Thome Martiris.

Sends mistress Cok's new lease, sealed and written. Legat and his son are clean left out, according to her desire, and the lease is just like the last one. Asks that Mr. Knight, fellow of London's college, may see her or her attorney seal the counterpayne, with the obligation to be renewed. Asks him to speak in favor of the university to my Lord, who is the high steward thereof. Mr. Fryar has incorporated all manner of craftsmen; so that the town and university will be undone if it continues. He has incorporated carpenters and slaters, though there are only two of each. The better carpenter spoilt a house which cost London 40*l.*, so that he had to pull it all down again, and has made a roof two foot narrower than the walls, and a foot too short. One of the slaters covered a whole side of the college, but it had to be pulled down the next year. If the townsmen would bind themselves to have always good workmen of the town, they might be sure that no others would be employed. Has a very good slater, a poor man, living here, who refuses the incorporation, as he cannot pay the charges. He and his men have been twice arrested this last week while repairing London's tenancies in the town, and every arrest costs seven groats. Are thus molested by these monopolies. Will not refuse any order for the better maintenance of the town, so long as they have their lawful liberty; but it was thought, when their liberties were granted, that they would have some encouragement above the laws. Now, ever since Mr. Mayor came from my Lord, they are in worse case than before. The commons in the colleges and halls are increased in price by the corporations, and lessened in quantity. In his own house they come to 60*l*. more than formerly. Sends a memoir drawn up by the commissary on the examination of the manciples. The desire of the university to have it examined is but reasonable. Their neighbors will not suffer a man to speak. Sixteen halls in Oxford have decayed in these few years, and there are not more than 140 scholars in all the halls. Unless these incorporations are laid down, and indifferent order taken for victuals, more halls will decay, and the town also. Till seven years ago the town was governed by the burgesses; but now all the commoners have interest with them, so that "sad" men cannot rule, which causes all the trouble. Oxon, 13 April.

In praise of the unprecedented encouragement given to letters by Wolsey, especially in the foundation of the new college, a work which would have been magnificent even if no more highly adorned than was intimated by the bishop of Lincoln cum illius primordia celebrarentur; for he said there were to be about 200 scholars. The magnificence of the occasion transcends their power of description, and they have requested the Bishop to report what took place. But they understand Wolsey has now resolved to augment the salaries of all the fellows (collegarum), and to establish seven lectureships, for which he will engage learned men from foreign countries; and that all the schools are about to be built at his own cost. If so, they will consider him no longer as the founder of a college, but of the university itself. The masters (rectores et praedices) have arranged a scheme of hours and places for the lectures, which Robert Carter will present to him.

2737. HUGO DE MONCADA and the DUKE OF FERRARA.

Summary of the conditions between don Ugo de Moncada, proctor for the Emperor, and Francisco de Villa, proctor for the duke of Ferrara, made at Gaeta, 30 Dec. 1526, in presence of the viceroy of Naples.

Don Ugo promises that lady Margaret of Austria, the Emperor's natural daughter, when of lawful age, shall marry don Hercules, son of the Duke, having Carpi and Novo as her dower. The Emperor will give the investiture to them and their descendants, and Vespasian de Colonna and the marquis of Guasto shall renounce their titles to the same. Till the consummation of the marriage, the revenues of these places shall be given to the duke's Capt.-General, to maintain 100 men-at-arms and 200 light horse, and the Duke must join the army in person when Bourbon orders him. If he is attacked while serving the Emperor, he may return home with his horse and what part of the army he chooses. The Emperor will not make peace, truce or friendship, without the Duke being included, and having restitution of all the losses and censures of the Church he has incurred in the Emperor's service. If the Emperor can procure the restitution of Modena, the Duke must pay as much of the 200,000 ducats which he offered for its restitution as the Emperor thinks fit; who, however, will reimburse him for money lent and expenses incurred in his service, even if it be not restored. If the Emperor makes a treaty with the French king, he will stipulate that the latter shall repay to the Duke the 90,000 [crowns] lent him.

Francis de Villa promises that don Hercules shall marry the lady Margaret according to the contract of espousals of 20 Sept. 1526, that the Duke and don Hercules shall make an instrument dotal; that in a year the jointure 2742. FRANCIS I. and PRINCESS MARY.

R. O.

A speech addressed to Henry VIII. in commendation of the proposed marriage of his daughter to Francis I.

The orator extols Henry's personal qualifications, ("fortunæ dotibus principe dignis, heroica corporis majestate, venerando vultu, aspectu et pro dignitatis certe ratione minime (?) formidabili, bellicis denique virtutibus")—his defence of orthodoxy against Luther, on whom he had inflicted such wounds that he had driven him almost to fury, ["ut cum cæteris nonnihil ludere sustinuerat, tibi non nisi conviciis potuit respondere."*] For the sake of the Faith he has been reconciled to Francis, and he may wage war against the enemies of Christ by the sword as he has done by his writings. He has always sought peace in war, and never swerved from the object of promoting the true Faith. He has undergone incredible labors in reconciling the differences of others, regarding the Turk as the only enemy. Henry will put the finishing stroke to his services in behalf of the Faith by giving his daughter in marriage to the most Christian king.

R. O.

They have always been accustomed to "occupy" the making and selling of bread for the city, according to acts of parliament and the city customs; and since the time of Edward II. they have been used to take up wheat arriving in London, at the prices given them by the mayor; but, within the last five years,* certain persons, aldermen and others, out of malice to the mystery, and "under colour of a common weal," procured that all the wheat coming to the city should be brought to the Bridgehouse, taken up at the mayor's price, and there garnered, and that the bakers should not be allowed to buy any other wheat but this. Articles were drawn up by the mayor, aldermen, and bridgemasters, binding the bakers to do this, which articles are ready to be shown to your Grace. By this scheme the providers of the wheat gain yearly 1,733*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* at the expence of the bakers and the commonalty. They sent an answer to this effect to John Brigges, then mayor. Last year they were compelled to take out of the Bridgehouse 2,000 qrs. of musty and unwholesome wheat at 13*s.* 5*d.* a qr. to make bread of, by which they "fell in great slander" amongst the commons, who said that the musty bread caused great infection and sickness. Persons have also been sent into divers shires to buy wheat at 7*s.* or 8*s.* a qr., whereas, before their coming, it might have been bought for 6*s.* or 6*s.* 8*d.*, "which seemeth more to use the order of regraters than to be governors of a good commonweal." Lately the mayor and aldermen tried to compel them to buy 2,000 qrs. of musty wheat at 12*s.*, when sweet wheat may be bought for 7*s.* or 8*s.* When some bakers refused, the mayor sent them to Newgate for 11 days, and shut up their houses and shops, not allowing their wives or families to visit them or sell their bread. They have in vain asked the mayors for the last five years for redress for these and other injuries, and have been continually rebuked, imprisoned, and wronged; and now ask Wolsey for some remedy that they may have sufficient living, and not be utterly undone.

Co[n]tain articles to be shown to the lord mayor] and aldermen on behalf of the mystery of the freemen bakers and [in] London.

They are grieved that hucksters dwelling at _____* and other hamlets and villages near the city, repair to it daily, and sell unwholesome bread made of divers grains, as they will prove before my said Lord.

By the old and laudable customs of the city the bakers of Stratford had certain places appointed them "to stand and make sale of their bread;" but now they have their men and horses, who go hawking through all the city and suburbs.

i. "Articles against Mr. Whithede, of Stoke College."

For wasting its woods, receiving money from Will. Bolen, of Stoke, to his own use; keeping back the pensions of Mr. Stanbanke and Mr. Scrope; not paying the fine due Easter 6 Hen. VIII. to Mr. Rany; retaining Dr. Brent's money for garnishing Mr. Grai's chapel; selling a chalice at London at Mr. D. Yakeslai's; retaining silver given to the college by Sir Jo. Turnor,—more, delivered him by Jo. Morese,—and a book of the library, called "Pupilla Oculi;" carrying the property to his benefice at Birbrouke; nailing up the hatch of the college with its common seal, with the registry, of which he has cut out certain leaves.

ii. Decree against him for non-residence by the dean Jo. Ednam, dated 13 July 1515.

iii. A second for violation of their 18th statute, declaring him incapable of residence for the next three years, sc. 1515–17.

iv. A third for immoral conduct in slandering the college, frequenting bad company in taverns, keeping a suspect person "under our noses in the town of Stoke," knocking in at 11 o'clock, coming out of suspicious places "in a dode fres coot, with a cluke in his neke, more like a layman than a priest," going to market at Ely with his servant behind him carrying his bags of saffron and his weights ready under his arm, "whereby he is called priest merchant of Stoke college by the farmers there."

v. His expulsion for one year, viz., 1518.

vi. "When he has met Mr. Dean in the church cloister or elsewhere, he has regard him no more than a cherrystone, facing, and in manner shouldering withouten any reverence doing, insomuch that Mr. Dean has been fain and glad to creep by the wall and give him the highway." He quarrelled with Rob. Popwell, prebendary of Stoke,—with Dr. Burton, vice-chancellor of Cambridge, prebendary there,—with Thos. Wardall, Dr. Wyot and Thos. Raynes, prebendaries.

vii. Proceedings for his expulsion on the grounds abovesaid, and reasons why he should not be restored.

viii. "A bill of [his] submission and of his new oath taking at his coming into his college again," 29 April 10 Hen. VIII.

ix. Articles against him since his return, from the 12th to the 18th year of Henry VIII. His offences committed when Wolsey visited the college.

2754. PETITION of JOHN ROO, curate of St. Christofer next the Stocks, London, to WOLSEY.

John Bromston, chantry priest, Ric. Reynolds and other parishioners, his enemies, have induced Emme Shyngleton, a single woman of lewd disposition, to accuse him of vicious living with her, and to impute a child of hers to him. She went to Mr. Warton, chancellor of the bishop of London, asking him to expel Roo, indicted him before the inquest of the ward of Bredstrett, openly accused him before the mayor and aldermen in the Guildhall, and before the bishop of London during his visitation, who commanded them to make a charge in writing, which they did, and the case was tried for 15 weeks. The Bishop ordered him to make his purgation, but Shyngleton forbade it, and the case was remitted to be tried in the Bishop's court, she being allowed counsel ; but because he was not immediately expelled, they say they can get no justice, and have proceeded no further at the spiritual law. Since then she has behaved in a most shameful way, gone privily into his house and left her child there, laid it before him in the choir during Divine service, and used shameful words. She has now been instigated to sue him before the sheriffs of London, alleging that on 16 May 18 Hen.VIII. he promised to her, in return for services past and to come, to find her clothing, pay her rent, and keep any children she might have, and that he owes her for this 800*l.* The matter is now at issue, and twelve men are sworn to try it. Desired certain householders of the parish to examine Shingleton, and she confessed no such promise had been made ; they went before the jury, who refused to hear them, being prejudiced by Reynolds and the others, and believed the witnesses against him, two of whom were women like Shingleton, and they intend to condemn him. Asks for a writ of certiorari to the mayor and aldermen.

Are in great danger from the landing of 16,000 troops, who are supported by the duke of Ferrara, and have crossed the Po into Parma. The priests are a special object of their hatred. They are at Borgo Donnino and Fiorenzuola. It is expected they will invade Modena and Bologna. John de Medici, who was engaged with them to prevent their passage, was, to our great loss, wounded by a musket ball, and is dead. The duke of Urbino, who succeeded him, did not pursue the enemy, and so lost a great advantage.

Has received news that the Viceroy has invaded Sienna with a strong fleet, and has now brought his forces and ammunition to Gaeta. The archbishop of Capua has been sent to make terms with him. They are in hopes of finding him well disposed. The Turks have been attacked by the Persians and Armenians; but if the Viceroy and others aspire to the command of Italy, he fears for the result. Affairs are very bad in Hungary. Twenty-two counties have chosen the Waywode of Transylvania for their king. Rome, 1 Jan. 1527. Signed.

Rome, 1 Jan.—I might have added something in reply to yours of the 2nd Dec., but am not less exhausted of words than the Pope is of money, who does all he can to support himself, waiting for supplies from the King and Wolsey. Had they been dispatched on the announcement of the coming of the Imperial fleet, they would have found us in some vigour; now the result is doubtful. Informed him of the conditions offered by the Viceroy to the General of the Franciscans, which were so extreme that the Pope would not accept them. The Viceroy was afterwards visited by the archbishop of Capua, who found him in a very different humour, as he was not yet influenced by the Colonnese, nor aware of the good disposition of the Pope to peace. The Viceroy said that he did not wish for a suspension of arms, but for peace with the Pope and the Venetians, with a sum of money, and some town as security. If the Pope were to grant these, they would then ask for St. Angelo, as they insist on the restoration of the Colonnese and the cardinal's hat for Prosper Colonna. To this the Pope would not consent by any means.

Bourbon has made a request that the Pope shall give him Lodi and Cremona, Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, &c., and shall purchase peace at 150,000 scudi. The Pope will resist if he is supported according to the letters from France of the 16th Dec.

The Viceroy has exacted from Naples 50,000 g. cr., and clothing for 20,000 men. It is necessary for the security of Rome to distribute the people at Tibur, Praeneste, Velitri, &c. If his Holiness were to increase his forces he might overawe his enemies, but he is compelled to provide for Tuscany, now threatened by the Germans. Demands of the Viceroy for entertainment of the Spaniards, &c.

ii. News from a noble friend, Jan 1.

The violence, abuses, and sacrilege committed by the Imperialists in Fiorenzuola. They rob the temples, slay the religious, make use of the holy oil and chrism to smear their shoes, cut the crucifix into a thousand pieces, and throw it into the fire. In Borgo Donnino, where stood an image of St. Anthony, they plundered the church in which the people had stored their goods for security, tied a halter round the image, as if it were alive, and hauled it up and down like a malefactor. Milan is empty of all its more respectable inhabitants under the protection of the Emperor. The Spaniards have taken 300 of the citizens for security of a sum of money they demanded, which the citizens refused. Unless we have help, Italy will be ruined. We have about 40,000 foot and 7,000 horse, but they are dispersed in garrison.

He would send three good personages to conclude the alliance, which he hoped, through the help of God and Wolsey's mediation, and other good ministers, would take a short end, "and the said Presid[ent] this was as much as th we should first be agreed then advise them to send desired him to consider that a [agr]eed upon never a one of our said d[emands] yd (said we) that ye may not do the ye may not do that, but what ye may do, o[r what] ye will do, ye have not yet declared. Asked therefore what they would do in recompense, that they might in return give him some light, whether this sending ambassadors to England should b[ring] any good effect. Dissuaded him from sending them while matters were still thus raw, lest they might return again void, and the affair be dishonorable to both parties, and told him that Wolsey advised [him] to send one of the long robes a[ft]er) "[h]ere we p [t]hey had desired us in th ones, so likewise we desired ist to make no sticking at know right [well] that without th nothing done." They still stuck, and after much debate as to the sum of money, [and what the] said salt might amount unto, we told them that in this the King was not flexible, and that if he would relent any thing, it would be rather in the residue of Guineas than anything else. Next day, dined with the Grand Master, th[ad]miral and Morett, who has served them well in soliciting their despatch. Were brought to the King, who showed them certain harts' horns, the largest they had ever seen. He said his cou[n]cil was ready and waiting to conclude upon their charge; at which they were more glad than if he had given them a great gift. Morett took them to the usual place, and shortly the President and Robertet entered, who told them they had made relation to their master “of all communications [had with them concerning] this charge, and how th

"1526-7, Jan. 3.—King Henry (by the bishop of Bath) makes to the French king three offers: (1) Marriage of his daughter, the princess Mary; (2) aid against the Emperor if he refuse to restore his sons; (3) renunciation of his title to France. And for these offers he requires: (1) a pension; (2) the county of Guisnes; (3) of salt an annuity. The French make a difficulty, and will not consent to these offers. And king Henry will not let his daughter go into France (which Francis desires) before the marriage may be consummated caruali copula, for which she is not yet ripe, being but 11 years old.

"At this time the princess Mary, as our ambassadors say (who speak rather the least, because they will not give her presently, which the French king desires), is 11 years old, and shall enter into 12 this Lent. Also, March 23, 1527, the French king saith his ambassadors inform him that the princess Mary is but 11 years old and 25 days. The King sent the princess Mary's picture (together with his own) to Francis."

In his last letters, dated Coldstream, 21 Oct., "referrit in ane part the answer of the King's instructions to the parliament" which began 12 Nov., where Sinclair presented the instructions sent by James to the King his uncle, and the answers thereto. Desired the lords of the Council, especially Angus, to send an answer; "and in conclusion I culd get na finale answer in the said materis bot differente." The agreement of the Queen and Angus is concluded. She is now with her son, and he is much counselled by her; which he fears will lead to dishonor, for she is quite opposed to the King's wishes. She has circumvented Angus, and got his assent that the abp. of St. Andrew's shall be with the King; which threatens a change, and the destruction of Angus. Hopes the King will provide a remedy in time.

Wrote last on Dec. 22, and also to Wolsey. Received on Monday his letters dated the 11th, with certain books. The same day, between four and five, had audience of the Privy Council, showed them part of Tuke's letter, the said books, and a warrant signed by my lord of London. Hooghestruet and my lord of Palermo concluded that my Lady should write to the Margr[ave] and council of Antwerp for the correction of all such books; which has been done.

Delivered her letters to the Margrave himself, in presence of the council of Antwerp. They answered that they would do their duty, and would tell him how they would proceed in fo[ur] days. A factor will be sent to conclude about the money. Thought that Tuke wanted ducat for ducat to be paid in Hungary, and that the principal should suffer no more loss than eight per cent. Perceives now that there is a fixed sum set apart for this. His intent has been to give as little interest as possible, and keep the money in the realm. His contract with the Hooghstetters is left to Wolsey's decision. A Hungarian ducat is esteemed here worth 5s. st.; which difference in value, with the interest, will amount to 8½ per cent.

Hears that the factor of the Velsers is in London, and others who would contract for this money. Hopes a better bargain will be made with them than can be made here. When he sees John Gabryel or Camyllo, will speak with them about Sir Thos. Spynelly's business. As for your go . . . there is no profit to sell it here. Will send it by the English ships when they leave Burrow Market. Will not forget the business with Mons. de Malroy, if he comes into these parts, "and as for Tomas I see no recovering upon this man without the come here himself."

Encloses a letter from Wallop to himself. The French king has given a blow to the Cardinal Salviati, and is coming to Bolleyn. Some say that the King's highness and the French king will meet on this side the sea about Lent. Antwerp, 4 Jan. 1526.

Has reckoned that the interest ought to be 8½ per cent., but the merchants there say it should be 8¼. This difference must be "revisited" there by them that shall pay the money, reckoning that giving 12 per cent. when we pay 4s. 10d. for a ducat is the same as 8¼ per cent. at 5s. a ducat.

Bologna, 5 Jan. Yesterday had a long conference with Lautrec. Urged him to advance, which he has agreed to do. The Pope will be under great obligations to the King and Wolsey. Lautrec will enter Naples by Pierno, and leave a garrison for the security of the Florentines. The Florentines have heard that the Emperor has sent into Germany 100,000 scudi. They are in good hopes for the present, but are in great dread for the ensuing spring. Lautrec urges the King and Wolsey to send the ratifications to the duke of Ferrara, who will give no help till he receives it. The Pope thinks that Ferrara must be satisfied. It is desirable that Wolsey, with the Florentine ambassador, should insist upon the better treatment of the Pontifical ambassadors by the Florentines.

"Ex literis Prothonotarii Casalli die v. Januarii datis."

The continuation of the war rests with the Pope, who will be firm for it if he is strengthened by the French king. It is thought that the Venetians will not consent to the duchy of Milan being given to Bourbon. Great part of the Imperial soldiers have left Milan, and have cruelly laid waste most of the country. It is thought if the Spaniards leave, the duke of Milan will come with a force strong enough to resist the Germans, though Louis de Bellejoyeuse remains there with 3,000 foot. If the Spaniards go towards Tuscany, the Venetians will follow them, and destroy them by starvation without fighting. The Florentines, through fear, will not prove equal to the occasion; but by letters to the captain of the Germans, intercepted by Bourbon, it appears they (illos) are preparing to attack Piacenza, which is well fortified. It is reported that a nobleman, head of the faction of Sforza, has entered Novara, and hopes it will be defended by his faction.

ii. "Ex literis dom. Gregorii, die vij. Januarii datis."

The Pope, notwithstanding what was said by his ambassador in France to the bishops of Bath and Worcester, will gladly consent that Milan should be placed in the King's hands. It was reported that the Germans had crossed two rivers, one beyond Fiorenzuola, the other beyond Piacenza, and that they were going towards Pavia. It was supposed that the Germans had left Pavia to protect those who had crossed the Po. Colonna's party are neglecting their affairs. The Viceroy has not yet left Gaeta. The Pope advises the King not to assist the Archduke against the Waywode, lest he be compelled to turn for assistance to the Turk, but rather to persuade the Waywode to treat, and the Archduke to give him his sister in marriage, whom he has already asked. It is said that Renzo brings no money, as was hoped, but says it was long ago sent by the Swiss. It is a question whether the French king has not recalled it, suspecting an agreement between the Pope and the Viceroy, and resolved on a different course. The archbishop of Capua (Capuanus) has sent fearful news, and a nephew of the General with the capitulation, of which an abstract is enclosed, to show the exorbitant demands of the Viceroy. Much deceit is visible in the Archbishop's letters. He writes also that the duke of Ferrara has been appointed captain-general in Italy by the Emperor, and that he will assume the office in three days. The Pope had determined to send Renzo to Abruzzo, and D. Orazio (Baglione) to Naples, through the March of Ancona, to join the fleet in an attempt against the Viceroy; but as he has no money but what he receives from the King, he cannot do either. The Pope is firmly resolved to defend himself as long as he can, and it is arranged that France shall take up the matter in earnest. Guido Rangoni writes that the Spaniards are in great straits for money. The Emperor is striving cunningly for universal monarchy (monarchiam). Let France and others look to it. It is the common opinion that only one way remains to crush the Imperialists, by attacking them vigorously in their extreme necessity. This would require 300,000 cr. The Pope has sent back the ambassador of the duke of Urbino to learn the state of affairs there, and what the Duke will do if the Germans turn upon Rome and Tuscany, which could not be remedied unless the Duke joined the French forces, and pursued them. The Pope sends to him because the Venetians entrust in great measure their military affairs to him, and he has got the Venetians to send a secretary to encourage the Florentines. They will send troops to Polesino against the duke of Ferrara, and the Pope into Romagna, if he is strong enough, for he fears lest Ferrara join the Germans in Reggio, and carry them pay.

When the agents of the duke of Milan heard that the Cardinal said he thought matters would be easier arranged if the duchy of Milan were granted to the duke of Bourbon, they asked Casale whether this was the intention of the King and Cardinal. Answered, in order to keep the Duke in the goodwill that he has always professed to bear towards the Princess, that these were rather incidental words than an expression of his wishes, and that the Cardinal always wished the duke Francisco to remain in the same state, as far as possible; but the ambassadors of other princes proposed that Wolsey should procure the duchy for Bourbon, that the Emperor might give him his sister Eleanor according to promise, so that the French king could not marry her, but the English princess. They proposed this because they saw that the peace for which the King and Cardinal were laboring would not be advantageous to them if it were made in any other way; and that if it be concluded as the Emperor and Francis wish, Eleanor will be given to Francis, and thus two great powers be united, and the rest less esteemed. Writes this because it must be observed that unless Bourbon has the duchy of Milan, the Emperor will not give him his sister; and it is impossible he should have the duchy, because isti principes will never consent. And even if the Emperor gave him the duchy, with the consent of the Italians and the French, he would only do it because he could not at the time keep it for himself, but intended to take it from him at the first chance, as he did to duke Francisco; and if he himself did not take it, his servants would, even though he forbade them. He will not give him his sister, if he gives him the duchy with this intention; and even if he do not consider all this, the Viceroy will, who will never allow Bourbon to be duke of Milan and a relation of the Emperor's.

Extracts from letters from Venice, 7 Jan.

The marquis of Saluzzo, with 10,000 foot, 500 French lances and 300 Venetian light horse, crossed the Po, and came to Parma, with the proveditor general of the Venetian army. Count Guido Rangoni has entered Piacentia with 1,000 foot, leaving the rest of the foot at Colorno, Sisi and other places near Piacentia, having made a bridge over the Po at Casal Mayer, so that the soldiers across the river might help those in garrison at Cremona, Lodi and Bergamo. The German foot keep within Fiorenzuola, in expectation of the arrival of the Spaniards and Germans, who are at Milan, and are short of food, as all the roads are intercepted by the allied cavalry. The Spaniards and Germans asked for three months' pay from the Milanese, spoiled the Hospitale Magnum and all the nunneries, took more than nine noblemen, from whom they extorted from 5,000 to 10,000 cr., as they were able, and then left, the Germans for Pavia, the Spaniards for Binasco and Clarela. Part remained with Bourbon, who was himself going to retreat. Moronus, who had been liberated for 25,000 ducats, and had given Bourbon for his share 15,000, is again detained by the Germans and put in irons. They say that they will leave to guard Milan count Louis Bellejoyeuse with 4,000 Italian foot. The Pope has set free Orazio Baglione at the request of the Signory. The admiral of the Signory writes from Civita Vecchia that the Genoese have sent to count Peter Navarre that they will surrender to the French king, and not to the Holy League, and the Count has, therefore, left Leghorn for Genoa with his galleys.

9 Jan.—Bourbon has gone to Pavia with the heavy armed horse. Ant. de Leva is still at Milan, intending to depart on the next day. All the places they passed through were plundered. They say they will cross the Po to join the Germans at Fiorenzuola, and then go to Tuscany. If so, the duke of Urbino, with the Venetian and French armies, will cross and pursue them. Letters have been received from Bergamo saying that the captain-general of the Swiss had arrived there with 400 foot; 1,500 were expected next day, and 7,000 in all were on the road.

15 Nov., from Constantinople.—The Turk entered the city with great pomp, called for the Venetian ambassador, and showed him great honor.

St. P. iv. 463.

Forwards letters received today from Berwick and out of Scotland, one of which is addressed to Wolsey from Patrick Sinclair. Sir Will. Parre, who is about to be despatched hence, will show Wolsey the minds of the Council. A right solemn and honorable Christmas has been kept here. The queen of Scots has got the archbishop of St. Andrew's brought back to court, and he has kept Christmas with the young king. Angus is said to have received a good sum to agree to it,—to his own probable destruction. He is gentle and hardy, but wants wit. The matter was managed by his uncle Archibald Douglas, provost of Edinburgh, against the will of Geo. Douglas and of Will. Douglas, now abbot of Holyroodhouse. Hearing of the raising of gold, Magnus has several times advised the abbot of St. Mary's, who has a great sum of the King's money in his custody, to have respect to that matter. Advises Wolsey to write to him, for though he has said well at all times, "right soon are grotes conveyed and put in for gold, and placks and pennies put in for good grotes." 2795. HUNGARY.

"A declaration of the choosing of John Vayvoda king of Hungary."

Nicolaus Hungarus, sent by the doge of Venice to report what has occurred since the arrival of John, Vayvode of Transylvania, reports that after the Vayvode had appointed a diet for the 5th of last Nov. in Alba Regia, he sent as ambassador Paul Maich with 200 horse, to ask for Alba Regia from the Hungarians, who held it; they delivered it up, and the Vayvode afterwards entered the town with 6,000 horse. Ferdinand also sent thither two noble ambassadors to tell the Hungarians that the kingdom belonged to him, and that he wished to come to receive the crown; but they were not admitted until after the coronation.

The Vayvode led forward D. Stephanus Verbecius, a nobleman of great wisdom and authority, who was formerly "Palatinus," and always protected the rights of the kingdom against tyrants. He asked them if they would have the archduke of Austria for their king, but all with one voice refused. He then asked them whom they would have, and they as unanimously named the Vayvode. This done, the exequies of the late king Louis were performed. On the next day, the 10th Nov., the Vayvode was elected King, and crowned on the day following, after which he sent for the Archduke's ambassadors, and asked them what they wanted. They said that as they were not heard before the coronation, they would say nothing further, and asked pardon from the King, which was granted, and great honor was shown them. The Vayvode immediately sent the bp. of Segna as an ambassador to Venice, with orders to go thence to the Pope and to France. The Turkish ambassador then came to ask for a truce for 15 years, which was concluded, with a clause that they should be friends of friends, and enemies of enemies, and should help each other when necessary. The King created count Chr. de Frangepani ban of Croatia and Illyria, and captain-general, and gave him 20,000 gold pieces for making preparations. He promoted Paulus Discus, bp. of Agria, to the archbishopric of Gran (Strigomium), and freed all the towns devastated by the Turks from all taxes for five years. He issued an edict that all the nobles should pay him homage in 15 days, on pain of being considered rebels. Several lords, with the Archduke, D. Stephanus Batther, Alexius Tursus, late treasurer, and Thos. bp. of Vesprim, met at Presburg, and elected Ferdinand king of Hungary, who was there on his way to Bohemia to be crowned, intending then to go to Hungary to try to obtain the kingdom. The Vayvode does not fear him, as he has on his side the Vayvode of Valachia and the Turk. He sent for the governor of Gran, who refused to come without a safe-conduct. This the King granted, but when he came put him to the torture, saying that princes did not give safe-conducts to bad men, but only to good men. The Governor offered the King 150,000 gold pieces, but he intended to extort a larger sum from him. Nicholas, while on the road, was detained at Vienna, and asked if he had taken money from Venice to Hungary, but after being threatened was allowed to return, and so arrived at Venice. 11 Jan.

2797. JOHN HACKETT to [WOLSEY].

Galba, B. x. 40.

B. M.

Wrote last on the 22nd Dec. Has since received a letter from Tuke, dated 11 Dec., with the books he asked for. Wrote to Tuke on the 4th inst. As he has already written, the Margrave and council of Antwerp, on reading my Lady's letters and my lord of London's verification in the first leaves of the said books, promised to give an answer in three or four days. At the end of that time the Margrave declared that, according to the Emperor's last mandment, these English books must be condemned to be burnt, the printer, Chr. Endhowe[n], banished, and the third part of his goods confiscated. The printer's attorney denied that he had transgressed the Emperor's mandment, that he had printed no books with heresies, that the Emperor's subjects ought not to be judged by the laws of other countries, and that unless the Margrave can show some particular heretical articles in the foresaid books, he ought to be set free from his prison.

After many replies on both sides, notwithstanding the lady Margaret's three letters, it is decided that the Margrave must declare some article containing heresy. Has, therefore, returned to complain to the Privy Council. After still more discussion, they say they must deliberate about it once more. Was so displeased at one time with them that he thought of buying up all the books and sending them to Wolsey; but when his choler was descended, by the advice of a friend, he determined to consult my Lady first. Two printers were taken; but only one, Chr. Endhowen, was found guilty. Has received a letter from the governor of our Merchants Adventurers at Barro, dated Jan. 4, saying that he had published the King's letters, dated Dec. 20, and would do so again when the ships came, which was six days ago. Has written to the lord of Barro, asking him to do justice on English New Testaments and other Lutheran books. My lord of Valleyne, his son, came hither last night, and told Hackett that his father would do such justice as would please the King and Wolsey, and wished Hackett to come to Barrow about the matter. Began to write this letter at Antwerp, and finished it at Mechline, 12 Jan. 1526.

They say here that the Imperialists prosper, and that they have taken Parma by force, that the Viceroy is in Naples, and the "Venty Wooglys" (Bentivogli) have entered Bologna, that the duke of Urbino would gladly make an appointment with the Emperor, that the Pope has great sufferance for the tribulation, and would fain make his appointment with the Emperor. Hears from Anabourche, 29 Dec., that the diet of Eisdynge was finished without any conclusion of the principal things determined at the last diet at Spire. There were more ambassadors than lords to conclude, and the Diet is therefore prorogued to Rates Bona. The newly elected king of Hungary has sent his ambassadors to don Fernando, saying that he is glad of Fernando's election to Bohemia, and he thought likewise he should be glad of his election to Hungary, for the Turk had sent to him offering him aid against any Christian princes who should attempt to dethrone him, if he would be obedient and tributary to him,—to which he would never consent, and with the friendship of Fernando and other Christian princes, he knew he was strong enough to win back all that his antecessor has lost, asking if Fernando would assist him. To this he answered that he would consult his Lords and send back an answer. The earl Salaman, a Spaniard, with another lord or a learned man, is coming as ambassador from Fernando to England. It is said that he was elected king of Hungary at Possonia, 16 Dec. Sends the names of his electors, and also those of the King. He has left Vienna for Prague to be crowned king of Bohemia on the 6th. The king of Poland has negotiated a truce between Fernando and the other King, for four months from 23 Dec. Maelyne, the day afore written.

Added in his own hand: Has spoken about the books to my Lady, who promises that in five days justice shall be done. Signed.

VOL. B. XXI. 27.

B. M.

Wrote last from Eslung on Dec. 28. Heard from a person who knows much of the affairs of Bohemia, that [Ferdinand] made great labour to be elected King, but the people would not consent until he offered to pay the debts of the late king of Hungary, 400,000 guildens, and the same sum for their good wills. It is thought that the king of Bohemia is sending Salamanka to ask the king of England for aid against the Turk. Thinks he intends first to make himself king of Hungary, and then to recover Peter Waradin. There are no other Turks in Hungary except at Belgrade, otherwise called Kryechyschwyssenbu[rg] (Griechisch-Weissenburg). It is thought he will do very little this summer unless the King helps him. What he will do will be decided at the diet to be held at Regensburgh at Mid Lent. On Jan. 16 he leaves Vienna, to be crowned at Prague. Intends to be there, "for if I should go to Vienna I should come to . . . of him." Thinks he will not allow him to go to Hungary. If so, will inform Wolsey. It is said that the Turk has sent to the king of Hungary for yearly tribute of four pence a man per annum:—100 pence make a ducat;—and it is thought he will agree, that the Turk may take his part against the king of Bohemia. The king of Poland's intention is not known. Moldavia, Wallachia, and half Croatia will take the Wayda's part. The Hungarians of the high country refuse him, saying that it was concluded in a parliament in the time of the late King, that if he died without issue the crown should devolve on Ferdinand; to which the Wayda agreed. The instructions lately sent by Wolsey to the Council here mention that orders had been given to Magnus to pay the earl of Westmoreland's fees, both for the vice-wardenship of the East and Middle Marches, and the vice-captainship of Berwick. On his coming northwards, Wolsey ordered him to pay Sir Chr. Daere and Sir William Evers for the offices of vice-warden out of the 1,000 marks assigned for my lord of Richmond's fee for the East and Middle Marches. Wolsey also sent a warrant dormant to the abbot of St. Mary's to pay such monies to George Lawson as Magnus should direct, for the wages of the garrison at Berwick, and for repairs at Warke Castle. Has, however, received no further instructions, and the earl of Westmoreland is not paid, as the Abbot has no warrant to do so. Enclosed copy of two articles of Wolsey's instructions to discharge the duke of Richmond against the earl of Westmoreland touching his fee as deputy-warden. 2809. UBERTO DE GAMBARA to [WOLSEY].

According to Wolsey's order, wrote to the Nuncio in France to press the French king to complete the marriage with the Princess.

The Nuncio's answer, dated Pussy, 9 Jan., is as follows :

Has spoken several times to the King about the marriage, and always found him inclined thereto. Has shown him that the Pope will highly approve of it, as conducing to the safety of himself and Italy ; and that it should not be delayed, as no better way could be found for the recovery of his children and the repression of the Emperor. The French king says he considers it concluded, and will send a chamberlain for the Princess's portrait, and shortly the bp. of Tarbes and the president of Toulouse will go thither as ambassadors. Will tell Wolsey the Italian news tomorrow, as the French and Imperial ambassadors will occupy him all day.

The bp. of Pola, the legate at Venice, writes on Dec. 16 that the bp. of Segni had come as ambassador from the Waywode, to inform the Signory of his election to the kingdom of Hungary by five bishops on St. Martin's day, to the great grief of the Archduke, who it is thought will go to war about it. Lest Wolsey should wonder that he has not yet done the business, writes to tell him that he is detained here at Viterbo, where the convent resides, on account of the war. When he had prepared the ships of the Order for sailing, was obliged to go in them from Villafranca to lest they should be intercepted by the fleets of the Emperor or the French king. When an opportunity offered, ordered the ships, well manned and armed, to sail towards the East, and to send his things on shore secretly, that they might be found more convenient, "ad facinus illud ingrediendum." Has signified this to Wolsey before, by Denteville. The Pope also is making every endeavor in the same matter. "Faxit Deus Optimus Maximus ut religiosus quidam noster quem illinc redditurum ind mutatum, sed rem conclusam referat ; nihil siquidem audendum nobis contra spure[ritiam] pratermitteremus, nulla vitæ ac periculorum habita ratione." Asks for Wolsey's and the King's support, and their recommendations to other princes, that the Order may be established in some safe place or in their old home. Will provide that power is given to the prior or another knight of the Order to exchange the preceptory of Sanctford, as Wolsey wishes. [Viterbo], 18 Jan. 1527. Signed.

Arrived at Valladolid on the 15th. There will be an assembly of the States, both lay and clerical, on the 25th, for a subsidy against the Turks. Communicated with Lee, and, with the advice of the Chancellor, proposed to visit the Emperor if he should remain away for any length of time. No news from Italy. Has used all his endeavors to find out if there is any secret practice between the Emperor and the French king. Can discover nothing. If there be anything it is likely to go through Madame Eleanora. Has nothing at present to write about. Thinks that they waste the time because the Emperor expects intelligence from Italy, or some result from the intrigues of Madame Eleanora. The chief negociators are the Chancellor, the bishop of Osma, the Emperor's confessor, and don John Emanuel, formerly ambassador to Leo X. It is supposed the Emperor will gain a large sum of money from the Cortes. Medina del Campo, 19 Jan. 1527.

The bishop of Worcester arrived here on the 15th. On perusing their instructions, thought it would be better to wait for the Emperor's coming to Valladolid, where the Chancellor and Council are. Is hourly expecting arrangement for his lodgings, which are difficult to obtain. Is much abashed to hear that Worcester can give him no news of Ichingham. He had been told that an Englishman was stopped, and was not allowed to pass unless he promised to go by the court of France. Hopes, however, that Wolsey understands the Emperor's intention, as he hears that don Ynygo is in England. Sent letters by Bilbao on the 12 Dec. Has not been able to write before on account of his journey from Granada. Before he left I had a secret interview at the Friars Observants with one who had been ambassador in Portugal for the Emperor, who told me, "that where now the Emperor had trade into the Indies of the spicery, and should now have great profit of the said spicery, he was determined to make a pragmatic that none his subjects should buy any spices of the king of Portugal;"—that the king of Portugal had wished to treat for the purchase of the spicery, but had found the Emperor difficult and untoward. As it is a thing of so much honor and profit, he asked me whether I thought the King would have it. He doubted not to find means to that end. He begged me to write to England upon the point. Lee declined unless he had some commission from the Emperor. He desired it might be kept secret. I told him the King could not enter on such a matter without communication with his council, that he might be induced to trust it in the first place to none but Wolsey. Lee asked him the particulars of the extent, revenues, and costs of these possessions, and what the king of Portugal had offered. He said 2,000,000. "I said he offered very much for a thing yet being in hope and little in hand, and that there of raysen the King ought to give more therefor than any man else; for that he should perceive most profit thereof, having his own spicery adjoining thereby." I said I wondered that the Emperor would make a pragmatic to annoy Portugal, whose sister he had married. He said the king of Portugal bore him no great favor.

He came to my lodgings three days after, when I told him that the King would not likely meddle with this matter, and create variance between princes. I demanded of him what answer the Emperor made. He said he would speak with him tomorrow, but he thinks he spoke of it to La Choult, who "laid to his charge that he would undo the king of Portugal," and thus produced, he thinks, an alteration of the Emperor's intentions. i. Commission to Sir John Arundell, John Arundell Treres, Jas. Erysey and Rob. Vyvean, to inquire touching the robbery of a ship belonging to John king of Portugal, which was wrecked upon the coast of Cornwall in Jan. 18 Hen. VIII. Dated "at our manor ——— • the day of ——— •."

ii. Petition of Francis Person, the king of Portugal's factor, stating that the wreck occurred on Saturday, 20 Jan. 1526,† near Gon Walbay, in the hundred of Correar, Cornwall. The ship had merchandise to the value of 16,000*l.* Most of the people in her were saved, and with the aid of the inhabitants recovered goods to the value of 1,000 ducats the same afternoon; but in the evening they were attacked by John Wylliam, miller, servant to Will. Godolphin, and two servants of John Melenton, captain of the Mount, who robbed them in their masters' names. Next day, being urged to sell the ship's goods, the Portuguese replied that they belonged entirely to the king of Portugal. When they complained of the robbery before certain justices of the peace they were told they could have no redress, as it was the custom of the country. At last the house in which they took refuge being broken into, and themselves put in great danger, Dego de Oliver was induced to sell the goods for fear of worse consequences; after which he was treated as a prisoner by the purchasers, Thos. Sent Albyn, Will. Godolphin and others, who carried him behind them on their horses, and rode about the country with him. On one occasion they made him break in upon his former comrades, and help to rob them of all they had, except their apparel.

Knows well the Pope's great anxiety for accommodation with the Emperor, who, professing that he desired nothing but peace, does nothing but prepare for war; otherwise the Viceroy would not have increased his demands, which cannot be granted. I told you of his last demand of 200,000 ducats for sending home the Germans. The Pope agreed, if he had time; and he then demanded 200,000 besides, and the restoration of the Colonnese. The Pope would have consented on certain conditions, but refuses to restore the cardinalate to Pompey, as it would be sacrilegious. These are the only points in dispute. The Viceroy has given no answer as yet; and, without waiting for the expiration of the truce made with don Hugo and the Pope on the 20th, has proceeded, on no offence, with his army to attack the States of the Church and laid siege to Frosinone. The besiegers are in great danger, but Renzo and Vitelli have resolved to succor them. The Pope does what he can to hold his position until he sees what help he can get from England. He has sold his property, and alienated what he could, for this purpose. All would be well if aid came from France.

The Emperor makes every effort* and has sent a commission [to the Viceroy] for peace with the Pope; and if he intended to observe half his proposals we should be happy. The Pope understands Wolsey's efforts for the preservation of the Faith and defence of England from the Lutheran heresy. The detention of his proctor (illius procuratoris) was agreeable to him. Campeggio says that he has heard Wolsey is not satisfied with him; at which he is much grieved. He has given no cause for it. You are to do your best to remove this scruple from Wolsey's mind, and you may use my testimony to that effect.

News from Lombardy, from D. Guicciardini, 27 Jan., Parma.

Bourbon and the other captains used all diligence to get out of Milan when the Germans crossed the Po, but could not persuade the Spanish foot, who demanded many months' pay (multa stipendia). At last they agreed for two months' pay for which they increased the exactions on Milan 14,000 ducats, and, this being insufficient, added 7,000 more. Nine companies (acies) of the best of the Spaniards remained at Milan to be paid; but he thinks the exaction was carried on till they were paid, and, that being done, they also will march out, as the others have done. The men-at-arms at Milan were thought to number 600. 300 have already been paid out of the money extorted from the city, and have left. To the other 300, who are ill equipped, they meant only to give one pay. In the duchy of Milan and Carpi are only 35 standards of Spanish foot, of which 25 have been at Milan all the summer. The latter are supposed to number 4,000. There are probably 4,000 German foot between Milan and Pavia, who require to be paid every 15 days, at the rate of 19,500 gold crowns a month. These payments have consumed all the money Bourbon brought with him, and all that he was able to extort.

The troops left the luxuries of Milan with regret. The extortions they had practised were worth more than three months' pay. They had grown effeminate, and used to wash their feet with rosewater. Antonio de Leva is to remain in the duchy, not being well. It is supposed they mean to attack Bologna along with the count of Cajazzo, and that the duke of Ferrara will join them with guns and stores, perhaps help them with money. Believes the Spaniards will act with the Germans, though they are said not to like each other. All authority is vested in Bourbon, who has left Antonio as his lieutenant. The marquis de Guasto went away unwell. Morone has been pardoned his life for 20,000 gold crowns (aurei), and left his eldest son in the castle of Milan as a hostage. Money could not be forwarded to the troops from Spain, as no merchants could be found to transmit it. It does not seem possible to pay the new Germans, about 12,000 in number. Hears that money was asked from the duke of Savoy and the marchioness of Montferrat. There are 300 families in Milan, each of which paid 1,000 gold crowns for the contribution, besides exactions.

Bourbon is still at Pavia. If the new Germans advance without money, or with the single aureus promised to each of them, it will be the greatest miracle of the Emperor's prosperity. The duke of Urbino has written from Mantua for us to meet him tomorrow at Casale Major.

St. P., vi. 341.

Since my last from Lyons I arrived at Chambéry, and found the duke of Savoy, who sent me with a herald, and a messenger with a commission to all his towns to aid me as they would himself. I was told by a gentleman of Savoy that unless I made haste I should be stopped by the Imperialists; so I pushed on to Savona, where I arrived on the 28th, and found it in great alarm. The garrison there had made a sortie, and after being assaulted had come to an arrangement with the Imperialists. I have spoken with count Petre de Navarre, the admiral, for a passage to Rome.

He desires me to wait three days, as the galleys have gone to conduct thither De Vaudemont. He tells me that the Pope has levied 10,000 men, and sent them towards Naples. If the Emperor's soldiers are not better paid it is thought they will return. Savone, 28 Jan. Signed.

Thanks him in the King's name for the good will he expressed to Felix ab Allen, the King's chamberlain, who has just returned. Offers his services to Wolsey, and desires his commendations to the King. Sends copies of letters containing news from Hungary since the death of king Lewis. The ambassadors of the Emperor and Ferdinand have returned from Muscovy, after making a peace for six years between the king of Poland and the duke of Muscovy. The duke's ambassadors with 700 horse, and the Apostolic ambassador, follow them. D. Mraiti is here as ambassador from Ferdinand, who will be crowned before Lent, and desires Schydlovycz or another to be present. The king of Hungary is at Gran. Unless the dispute between him and Ferdinand is settled, war must ensue; by which the enemies of Christianity will profit. Cracow, 29 Jan. 1527. Signed.

Cæsar Fieramosca has arrived, and demanded in the name of the Viceroy [150,000 ducats], Parma, Piacenza, and Civita Vecchia as pledges, the restoration of the Colonnese, and 300 men-at-arms, 400 light-armed horse, and 4,000 foot, as aid for the Emperor in Italy, and for Bourbon to be duke of Milan. The Pope read these terms in the public consistory, and all the cardinals rejected them. Fieramosca then presented to the Pope a letter in the Emperor's own hand, in very mild terms, condoling with him for the injuries he had received from the Colonnese, offering to avenge him, and to do whatever he thinks best for universal peace.

They then agreed that a suspension of arms would be very acceptable, and wrote to Venice for consent.

Believes the Pope will pay the 150,000 gold pieces proposed. The Imperialists say that doubtless the Emperor will have an interview with the Pope if he wishes.

Hostilities are suspended for eight days, till an answer comes from Venice. If a general suspension is taken, which he does not think likely, neither the Pope nor Venice will take up arms again. Bourbon will thus establish himself in Milan, and the Emperor be lord of Italy.

The French are to blame for not giving help in time, but the destruction of Italy will ruin them also. The Pope has done and is doing more than his power permits, in sustaining the expences here and in Lombardy, 100,000 [ducats] a month, for which he is parting with all he can, trusting to the promises of his friends. The only hope they have is the marriage of the Princess with Francis.

Letters from France have come of the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 13th, promising wonders. D. de Vademonte has landed at Civita Vecchia, and one French noble has come hither with money. This may do some good, but the amount must be greater, and come as soon as possible, "quoniam salus nostra non consistit in quinquaginta millibus."

The Germans in Lombardy have joined the Spaniards, and threaten Piacenza,—which, however, is well fortified.

The Venetians have crossed the Po into Parma with 7,000 foot and 400 horse. Urbino has his camp on the other side, ready to cross or stay, as necessary. Alarcon is wounded, and probably dead. Any delay will disperse the enemy, who have no money. "Dux Ferraria non currit tam furiose ut dubitabatur." It will not be wonderful if some day Bourbon is sold like a lamb in the shambles.

Had not spoken with the Emperor when Chr. Mores arrived on the 22 Jan. His Majesty only came to Valladolid on the 24th, and appointed the 26th to give them answer. Ghinucci declared the object of his mission, se., that as the Emperor had written to the King, and desired him by Botton to mediate a peace, the King desired to know his mind as to particulars. Here I paused. The Emperor said he adhered to his purpose, but could make no answer about particulars, as he demanded nothing. If any reasonable offers were made to him he would descend to particulars with good will. I replied that he could not say he demanded nothing, as he still adhered to the treaty of Madrid, which the King hoped he would mitigate for his sake, and for the public weal. He answered that Bayard, a secretary of the French king, was now come out of France, and that other letters came before for the French ambassador, which he would hear and make answer to. "Nevertheless he said* A. Hitherto for this point."

Advised the Emperor to state his mind about Milan;—whether for the satisfaction of the confederates he would put the whole state in deposito of one such as he and the confederates could agree on. He said this would be to the prejudice of Bourbon, to whom he had granted it; and when Ghinucci said that Bourbon's interest was only in case it were proved that Sforza had forfeited the dukedom, he said he would think over the matter with his Council.

Ghinucci then proposed abstinence of war in Italy pending negotiations. Charles said he would agree to one for four or five years, but a truce for three or four months would be injurious to him; moreover, it was needless, as nothing could be done this winter time. Suggested that England might be a security for him, and that he might be more compliant if nothing could be done in winter. He said he would like to have peace first, and might perhaps consent to an abstinence after. Ghinucci said he ought rather to begin with abstinence than end with it; and he said he would think more of it. We were then dismissed. Saw the Chancellor in the afternoon, who said the Emperor had been always inclined to peace; which, he said, Lase well knew that he had twice declared to the King, and that he had sent with the last letters by Echyngham "mandatum in Angliam ad tractandum et concludendum de pace universali et particulari," with such full instructions to his ambassadors that there needed no further occasion to refer to himself. He thought the Emperor was the first who had sent any commission to England, and he had sent another to Rome, besides urging the ambassadors of the confederates to send for commissions; so that he is ready to treat either here, at Rome, or in England. When we said we thought the French King's commission was by this time in England, "he said, somewhat smiling after his manner, B."

Desired him to be a mediator for abstinence of war in Italy until peace should be concluded. He said if they desired truce for four or five years no doubt the Emperor would consent, but not for three or four months,—and that ere long he thought we should find they had not been idle.

Went next to the Nuncio's, where we met the ambassadors of France, Florence, Venice, and Milan, also Paulus, one of the Pope's chamberlains, who came to the Emperor at Toledo in his journey from Granada, bringing mandata ad nuncium, ad oratores Gallum, Venetum, et Mediolanensem. There the French and Venetian ambassadors read their commissions, declaring they could do nothing without us. "Milan said he had mandatum, but none he read; of Florence stood covert under the Nuncio's commission." The French ambassador pretended to declare his full instructions, but, as we afterwards found, declared only part. He said he wished it had been treated in England, and would conclude nothing till he had sent to his master again. He produced an article which he said was part of the league between Henry and Francis, dated 30 Aug. 1525, that Francis should make no conclusion with the Emperor unless the King should repute himself content of all the Emperor's debts to him; another that he should make no peace without comprehending England; and a third, that he should not aid the Emperor if the King made war upon him to recover his debts. "This he read openly. We mused what he meant thereby, &c." On the Nuncio urging how desirable it was to bring the affair to a conclusion, he asked whether we would consent? We said, Certainly, to the peace, which we were expressly sent to advance; "but if he demanded whether for the King's interest we would consent, we have no consent ne dissent herein, for we be no party."

Next morning (Sunday) Lee wrote to the French ambassador to lend him the copy of the article. He said he could not without the consent of secretary Bayard; after speaking with Bayard, he sent to tell Lee he would shew it him at the Nuncio's house. Sent a servant, asking leave to borrow it; but he said he could only deliver it into Lee's own hands, which he did on meeting him. Told him we had no knowledge of the article from the King, and that if Francis wished to know the King's mind he was nearer him than we. Cannot understand what he is driving at.

Were sent for next day by the Chancellor, who told them on the Emperor's behalf, who wished to hide nothing from the King, that the French ambassadors had been with him on the Sunday, and presented the articles of the treaty of Madrid, which Francis would have reformed, and that his Majesty would that he should show them to us, C.

We then went to dine with the count of Nassau, with whom were La Chault and De Pratt. After dinner they began to talk of these treaties, which they wished to bring to some good conclusion, "and so fell into further communication such D."

There is no hope any fruit will come of the treaty if Francis insists on his demands for reformation of the treaty of Madrid. E.

Dined with the Chancellor on Wednesday, 30 Jan., who told them the Emperor wished all things that should be done about the peace to be "communed to us liberally and familiarly, as the orators of that prince in whom he had put his most affiance, from time to time, as they shall happen D.*"

He gave us news from Italy of the 29 Dec., that the Pope was abashed at hearing of the Viceroy's arrival in the haven of St. Stephen's, and thought to go to Pisa and leave Rome; that the Viceroy had restored two ports to the Sienese; that the Pope had sent the General of the Observants to the Viceroy to ask abstinence for six months, which the Viceroy refused unless he would pay the Emperor's army meanwhile; and that his Holiness had afterwards sent the archbishop of Capua, offering "to find the Almains." It was not known whether they had yet come to an agreement. Also, that the duke of Ferrara had sent men, money, and ordnance to the Imperialists; (Lee hears that the duke's eldest son is to wed the Emperor's bastard daughter, and give the Emperor 200,000 ducats;—that the Orsini and Colonnas waste each other, and the cardinal of Colonna is deprived. A., it would be very difficult to trust the French king, for a merchant who had broken faith was never trusted afterwards. Urged that the Emperor might at least trust Henry's mediation, and if France could not be induced to do right otherwise, she might be compelled.

B. "The French tell us quite another tale, saying that unless we agree to their demands in eight days they will be compelled to act with others. Quo elucident hoc enigma quod veriti sunt nobis impartiri. Alii commiserunt palam scribere; is vero scribit parum nunc abesse ut prope diem de ineundo matrimonio concludatur Regia Francis cum filia Regis Angliae."

Said he would perhaps let the ambassadors see the very letters in which the French had boasted to this effect; and added, smiling, "O, how well I know these tricks and lies of the French! How well the king of England would dispose of his daughter si morbi illius Gallo infecto cum nuptus traderet, qui, acuti ad nos scribunt, haud ita multo pridem solavit in hypocaufto!" This appeared incredible to us. But Lee answered that he had twice confuted the rumors got up by the French,—first, on his first going to the Emperor, when they said he brought nothing but threats; and again, when they told everybody that the king of England had not only entered the league of Italy, but was considered its protector. He therefore hoped soon to put them to shame a third time.

C., that we might judge whether they were the propositions of a man sincerely inclined to peace. He also asked Jo. Allemand to read us some extracts of letters from France; of which we enclose a copy, that the King and Wolsey may judge "cum quibus Protheis rem habemus."

• f. 12.

• From what we have heard here we perceive that nothing can be done in France with so great secrecy that is not told here, even by the intimates of the king of France. By these means, as the Chancellor told us, they became acquainted with the most secret articles of the Italian league, and the conditions offered to the king of England to join it, as you will see by the extracts; and who, except some yeoman of the guard, could have blabbed that the French king was sweated ob morbum quem vocant Gallum? The Almoner heard from John Allemand that one of the French king's chamber, when he was sent to England, exclaimed "Ohe! quales ego nugas, quam insigne prestigium ego mecum in Angliam porto ut Regi illudam!" Think that great caution must be used in whatever is communicated to the king of France, and that he should make no further advances, nor grant them so freely what they desire, if it be true what the spies said, that the French are attempting to cause the King to fall with both powers. If Francis will persist in his unjust requirements, the Pope must not incur extreme peril to foster the French king's iniquity, but condescend to terms, as the other Italian confederates will do. Apologises for offering this advice.

D. that it was evident they were greatly exasperated against Francis, of whose faithlessness they spoke in very strong terms. They proposed a league between the Pope, the Emperor, and the king of England, "parum nobis pensi nisi habere quid tunc ageret Rex Francie." Wishes the King would adopt such a course. It is too plain to be denied that this Prince has erred; but at such an age penitence ought to be allowed, and he accommodates himself in everything to the King's wishes, while there is no faith on the other side. In this conversation Nassau said, "Bene res habet." The French king's sons are hostages in our hands, and if Francis should die while they are with us, the king of England and we will provide a fit governor for France." Speaks of the double-dealing of the French, who by secretary Bayard have offered the enclosed articles to the Emperor, pretending that they only wanted to thank him for his generous treatment of the French king's sons. Next day they consulted at the Nuncio's in what manner it would be best to begin negotiations. It was arranged, the French speaking first, first to offer their mandata to the Emperor, then in a general way to urge their demands as if they had not already made them specific; and for a further blind, they sent Lee the overtures they were going to make to the Emperor, i.e., those that they had revised at the Nuncio's house, adding that they were bound by the treaty with England not to conclude, unless the King's debts were paid. Lee, following their own tactics, praised their purpose, and said we would write to the King. Even when their King was a prisoner at Madrid, and Lee was sent to intercede for him with the Emperor, they would not let him, the bishop of London, or the Dean know anything of their affairs. One may judge of the cordiality of Francis from his refusal to send to England a commission to treat for peace, which the Emperor did at once.

E. The Emperor's council think he cares neither for peace nor for the redemption of his sons, but has some views which nobody understands. The Emperor, however, will certainly not refuse to treat with the Pope and Italians, "rejectione scrupulo ligæ quo cavetur ne sine consensu omnium confederatorum ad id minimum inducent." Would like to know as soon as possible what the King and Wolsey think of this, and whether any other commissions than the Emperor's has yet arrived in England. Send back this messenger in all haste, though negotiations are scarce begun, considering the great importance of what we have written.

D*. He then told us that the French ambassadors had been with him, and had shown him a commission written in French (though they showed us a different one in Latin), in which he said he had discovered two faults; first, that it made mention of instructions which did not appear; and second, that there was an article about restoring Francis Sforza.—a matter in which the Emperor was not to be dictated to by the French king. As to the first, they had explained matters by producing their instructions, signed by Francis, differing from those they had already shown only in the 20th article, which the ambassadors explained as merely referring to the provisions of the Italian league. The latter instructions, though not in accordance with the treaty of Madrid, were more just on this point than the former. By the treaty France was bound to furnish a certain number of men and vessels for three months from the day the Emperor embarked, on the faith of his letters only; but Francis now refuses the pay of the soldiers, and demands security for the return of his fleet. The Chancellor said he wondered they proposed conditions, which they had already twice offered to De Praet and the Viceroy. "One thing," he said, "you must grant me. Your King either cannot fulfil what he agreed to do, or he will not, or he ought not. If he cannot, he should return to prison. If he will not, it is unkindly. If he ought not, show your reasons." The marquis of Montferrat, who was present, said, "I wonder you have not another commission;" on which they immediately indicated that they had, and produced the Latin one in a meeting at Nassau's chamber, which we had seen before. This contained authority to treat for universal peace, though they only aimed at a particular one. The clause in their commission stating that they were not authorized to conclude without the consent of England, the Emperor's council think, was intended partly to destroy the effect of their commission, and partly to sow discord between the Emperor and England. The Chancellor thinks the Nuncio and Venetian ambassador have other commissions also.

There is one Cornelius here, of Nieuport in Flanders, of whom I [Lee] spoke in my letter of the 3rd Dec. When two natiivities, somewhat different, were brought him of king Francis, he plainly affirmed that both were true, and that he whose natiivities they were would die within the year. Thinks this is of sufficient importance to be told to Wolsey. I have heard an extraordinary tale attributed to Robertet, that great offers and earnest solicitations were made by Fitzwilliam for a marriage between Francis and the princess Mary, and that Morette had made frequent voyages to England for this purpose. Francis refused, and greater offers will be made by Henry, who has offered to assist him in recovering his children, and make war upon Flanders. Another person, of some repute, has warned the Emperor that the practices for this marriage have far advanced, as the king of England is only attempting, more suo, to hinder the alliance between Francis and the Emperor; "verum dicit se videre rem conclusam in commodum et augumentum (sic) Gallorum, et si non provideatur ad hoc, esse vera media ut aliquid

Summary of his last letters of the 19th. The Emperor arrived on the 24th. Had an audience on the 26th. In conformity with their instructions of the 31 Dec. and 22 Jan., Mr. Almoner will describe the conference. He urged that the Emperor had been well treated by the King taking upon him to manage the peace, as the interests of the Emperor would better be regarded, and France be more induced to observe its obligations. He replied that he would take it into consideration. When the deposit was strongly urged he made a similar reply. Has no hopes ever since he asserted that he had granted the duchy (status) to the duke of Bourbon. He refused to consent to an abstinence of arms, and would listen to no arguments to be urged on that head. This refusal was repeated by the Chancellor, who told us openly that the Emperor would never consent to an abstinence except on condition of a truce for five or at least three years. Will learn by their letters the subjects of their interview with the French ambassador. Refused to enter into any consideration as to partnership (participatio) as being beyond their commission.

Stated that it was not in their power to consent to a treaty of peace, as the King had resolved upon neutrality. It is said the Venetians have taken Urbino. Other news of Italy, and of the disputes between the French and Imperial ministers. Valladolid, 31 Jan. 1527. Signed.

"Ex literis D. Wigorn., xxvj. Januarii datis."

Suggests that occasion should be given to the Imperial ambassador to write to the Emperor that the peace negotiations had already been begun by Henry, that the Chancellor and others here may see the affair is no longer entirely in the Emperor's hands. Wolsey can make it appear, by the date of his letters, that he had written to Ghinucci before he could have had letters from Spain. Wrote, in his other letters by the bearer, what the French have been negotiating here. Wonders if their object is only to make the Emperor think, especially considering the things sent to his councillors as from a spy in the Emperor's court, that they are on the eve of concluding with the King. Is glad to think the King and Wolsey are not in the dark like himself. Cannot tell why these Imperialists do not communicate with us, unless they suspect we know all from the French ambassador, "vel forte ideo id facere, ut quoniam potuerunt comprehendere desiderari istic incutionem (inceptionem?) videatur minus durum Regis Majestati si hic de pace tractetur, quasi (quam si?) in ipsius pacis tractatu suae Majestatis oratores interveniant."

Wolsey will perceive, both from their common letters and from his own, that there was no opportunity for carrying out his particular instructions. Master Almoner thinks that whatever has to be written in cipher should be in Worcester's cipher, as being the more difficult. As in this correspondence I perform the part of a prompter only, "cupio omnia, ut par est, ab eo recognoscere, ea saltem quae partem judicariam et consultoriam concernunt."* Does not know if it was mentioned in their joint letters, "alia mandata de quibus in ipsis literis fit mentio pura esse." Heard this from the same person who informed us of the rest.

It is said the king of France will not consent. Notwithstanding their liberality, the pontifical Nuncio, who is in the confidence of the Emperor, told a friend that the Imperial ambassador, notwithstanding his instructions for peace, is to do nothing without consulting the Emperor.† If peace is to be had, the Chancellor will use his efforts that it should be by his means. The French king has hitherto negotiated by means of Madame Eleanor. There is no treaty between the two courts, and no one here in behalf of Francis except one Bayard, a relative of Robertet. He has frequent interviews with the ambassadors at the house of the Nuncio. We have been twice invited to attend. Will find out what is going on. The Imperialists pretend to have confidence in the King, although they have none. They have told us the news from France, that there is some intelligence between France and England, and they are afraid of the union of the two, probably because the conditions lately proposed by Francis are wide of the previous ones, "nisi dicamus id solum factum ad hoc ut facilius Caesar concedat concessibilia quae ad hoc videntur tendere ut Caesarem premant in Hispania." This does not seem probable, for without the support of England the French could not force the Emperor. I do not understand these mysteries, and have resolved to dislodge them from my thoughts, as I am not likely to fathom them. The Imperialists have news from Italy which they have not communicated to us. They only inform us of what they learn from France. Thinks it relates to nothing more than the Emperor's preparations. If the struggle is protracted he will submit to honorable conditions; if not, he will be arbitrary and obstinate.

Has set it afloat in the ears of lady Eleanor that the French king is anxious for a marriage with the princess Mary. Details the method which he has employed to counteract the report that it is not the Emperor, but others, who stand in the way of the peace, without which no joint effort can be made against the Infidels. "Isti res Turcarum ita pingere, ut necessitatem et facilitatem eodem tempore praeponere" (sic).

Has endeavored to persuade the French ambassadors that their master was much mistaken in supposing that the peace could be treated of here. They are anxious that all things should be referred to England. Some of the Imperial councillors say that the Emperor has little trust in the King, and less in your Reverence. Although the Emperor pretends to wish for peace, he is only deceiving, and waiting the turn of events in Italy. The count of Nassau told us, if the Pope, as he hoped, and the king of England, were joined with the Emperor, Francis must be reasonable; and though he apparently showed himself satisfied to have the peace by means of England, it was only an artifice. When we were dining with him, Lashaw, and De Praet, they told us that the Emperor's nature was such that he would yield to gentle means, but not to violent;—hinting, as I think, to the intelligence between the kings of France and England. Avoided speaking of the mediation of the king of England, lest he should be thought importunate in wishing to transfer the negotiation to England; but in a few days will take an opportunity of urging on the Imperialists that there is a much better chance of peace by the mediation of England, and greater security for it. Will take every opportunity of doing what is required. Has urged upon the confederates that the best chance for each state to retain its rights is to refer the whole to the king of England, as a man of honor. The Imperialists have referred to the matrimonial negotiations between France and England, to which he made a general answer, "Præter id ostendebant se nullo modo talia credere, quamvis—"

2833. CHARLES V.

R. O.

Answer of Charles V. to the Nuncio and French and Venetian ambassadors.

The Emperor has always desired a universal peace, for the sake of attacking the common enemies of the Faith. With this intention he made a treaty with Francis, gave him his sister, and allowed him to return to his kingdom, not doubting that he would keep his word, and persuade other princes to join a universal peace. Instead of this, war has been kindled afresh, Hungary is being devastated, and its King is killed, heretics are growing stronger, and a treaty has been made against himself.

Nevertheless, he first sent instructions to Rome in case a peace were treated of there, as the Pope seemed to offer; then, when the king of England professed readiness for the same, and asked for instructions to be sent to the ambassador with him, saying that the other allies would do the same, the Emperor sent to him also the most ample instructions and honorable terms. Lastly, the Nuncio and the French and Venetian ambassadors at the Emperor's Court said they had ample commissions, and urged him to appoint some one to treat with them. Their commissions, however, afford no sure basis. That of the Pope, besides ascribing all the blame of these wars to the Emperor, gives no power to treat of peace without the consent of his confederates, who are not named, and many of whom are probably unknown to the Emperor. That of the French king errs in requiring the consent of confederates, and especially the king of England, who has expressly declared to the Emperor that he has not joined and would not join the treaty, but wished to be the author of peace. There is also no mention of the former treaty, so that by the commission nothing could be done contrary to it. The commission of the Venetians requires the consent of Francis Sforza and the Florentines, and, as shown by the Venetian ambassador himself, of every one of the confederates; it has, therefore, the same fault as that of the Pope. Besides, the method proposed by Balthassar Castillon, the Nuncio, on the part of all the allies, would hinder, not promote, universal peace. Nothing could be more dangerous, while the Turk threatens them, than a short suspension of arms in Italy, to treat of particulars. This would neither allow their arms to be turned against the Turk, nor would it allow the Emperor to disband his army.

He will consent to a general truce for three years or longer, during which they may attack the Turks, and settle with greater safety their disagreements.

The restitution of Francis Sforza is no concern of the allies, as he is a vassal of the empire, and accused of treason. Others, however, to appoint impartial judges to hear his defence. As to the restitution of the French princes, it accords neither with reason, law, nor justice. If the treaty cannot be performed, the King can free them by returning to his captivity. They can adduce no reason why it ought not to be performed. If he does not choose to perform it, it will not be safe to enter any other treaty with him. Notwithstanding the injustice of these demands, the Emperor is willing to accept fair conditions, and does not object to leave it to impartial arbitration, on condition that the expedition against the Infidels is not delayed. The Nuncio's last stipulation, that the money owing to the king of England shall be paid, is absurd, as Henry does not belong to the League. His ambassadors with the Emperor have not attended this meeting, and the princes are so connected by blood and affection that no money matters could disturb their friendship. His ambassador in England has ample instructions about it.

The whole demand seems therefore useless, and tending to promote rather war than peace; but to show that he is quite ready for peace, the Emperor has ordered this answer to be given to the Nuncio and other ambassadors present, and a public instrument thereof will be prepared by the notary.

Wolsey should cause him to do penance and leave her. Wolsey's subjects are commonly called to appear in London before his offices in causes of correction, and sometimes at the promotion of light persons, without reasonable cause. Vit. R. ix. 26.

R. M.

A gentleman of the French king's chamber, who left the Pope six or seven days ago, says his Holiness "dath very well, and [that he is] mynded to follow this enterprise." The Viceroi is besieging a town of the Church's, 40 miles from Rome, whither the Pope has sent his army, 9,000 picked men. It is thought there will be a battle in two days. The Imperialists are 12,000 of all sorts. The Pope was lately in great fear for money, but he has now levied 40,000 ducats, besides 30,000 which the French king has sent him by Vaudemont, who left Savona three days ago. His Holiness expects to get 60,000 or 80,000 more in February. Has waited here four days for passage. They are in great fear here, for 5,000 or 6,000 Imperialists arrived yesterday within 24 miles, and the town is not strong. This town is very necessary to Francis to keep Genoa from victuals, for the passage to Rome, and for the lying of the army. It is thought the Imperialists are going to victual Genoa. Has lost 13 days by his stopping at Paris and here. Savone, 1 Feb. Signed.

"Exemplum literarum R. Legati in castris Pontificis contra Vice-regem ex Frusimone die iij. Februarii, hora xviii., ad R. Legatum."

This morning before daybreak they set fire to certain stores, and left a number of cannon balls and culverines (mediarum calubrarum), probably because they had not cattle to carry them away. Thus they quietly departed, as some say, with guns in their hands. Our light cavalry infest their rear, hoping to disperse them. When we have got the victory, we intend to make good use of it. Will not hear of the Pope paying 200,000 [ducats]. The Datary must not bind him to such vile conditions as were proposed to him. It is for him to impose conditions, not to accept them. It will be easy for the Datary, by a word or letter, to take from the Pope the citadel (of St. Angelo), Pallanum and Monte Forte. Wishes the Datary to send money and stores, and peace will be made everywhere far and near. Hopes the Pope will forgive him afterwards for not obeying him, unless he thinks they ought not to have followed up their advantage. Requests him to tear up the capitulations, and prepare those 200,000 [ducats] to exterminate the enemies of the Holy See, not to preserve them. Has despatched a German nobleman, a prisoner of those Swiss, who promises that he will bring over 2,000 of the enemy to the Papal side. If he do, hopes entirely to crush them; but in any case will pursue them till they give up. They are taking the road to Cecanum. Will move the camp tomorrow. No more letters will be sent to Fieramosca, since he would not await their reply. Prisoners are being continually brought in, so that it is evident they will soon be completely routed.

Has not written, on account of the daily despatches of the Grand Master. The procuration of the merchants has not been forgotten. The Grand Master has written the cause of the delay. Hopes to be this week in Paris to convene the merchants and settle this article. All the processes about "le faict des Angloys" have been decided. The King is in good health, and is with his mother, who is suffering from gout, though the pain is better today. The Admiral is going to Burgundy. Most of the other governors are in their provinces. The Cardinal has received his hat and his title, "et si haas apertum." He has called together a provincial council. St. Germain-en-Laye, 4 Feb.

Copy of a letter from the bishop of Pola, dated Venice, 5 Feb.

Wrote last on the 28th ult. Has since received letters from Rome of that date, and later, saying that the Pope has entered into a truce with the enemy for three years, but the capitulations are not yet finished. If the French king and the Signory would join it, the Pope hopes to bring about a good universal peace, and has commissioned the Bishop to ask the Signory to send instructions for the purpose to their ambassador at Rome. Received answer from them at the fifth hour last night, that they had discussed what he had said in the Senate, and saw that if such a treaty passed, the Pope first and then all Italy would be ruined, as the Pope would have no security for the fulfilment of the promises of the Imperialists; they would, therefore, write to their ambassador to exhort the Pope to keep up his courage, and that they would not fail to aid him, especially as the enemy seem in difficulties, while their forces are flourishing. If he wishes to make a treaty, he should wait for a month, so that he can hear from the French king, and conclude what he wishes. Wrote an account of this yesterday to Rome. Received today letters from the Pope's nuncio with the Archduke, dated Vienna, 15th ult., stating that ambassadors came on the 14th from Presbourg to tell the Archduke of his election; and that the Turk is making great preparations, and has sent 20,000 horse to Belgrade. The English ambassador is daily expected by the Archduke.

Extracts of letters of the prothonotary Camale, 5 Feb.

Visited the Doge for a conclusion of the matter, who replied that the Senate had come to no arrangement at present as to the truce, as they thought that the kings of France and England, the two chief heads of Christendom, were not contented with it, and that they had written to the Pope not to condescend to any such thing. He had urged that some treaty should be formed to give the confederates better means of preparation. Now things are changed, and the Imperialists are in worse state than before, for then they had wished to subjugate the whole world. They impressed upon the Pope the necessity of trusting to his allies, and of waiting for aid, which was soon coming. If, however, he was resolved to adhere to his determination, he would allow some opportunity for the kings of England and France to be consulted. But as matters now stood, they refused to make any concession as to the treaty. They begged the writer to urge upon the King and Wolsey, that, considering how zealous the Venetians had been from the commencement of the league, they should not now be abandoned in their great necessity.

"Ex literis D. Gregorii, die ultimo Januarii datis."

Today urged the Pope not to treat further "de hoc federe," and, as he valued his own safety, not to help the enemy with money, for he now has everything he can ask for, viz., money for continuing the war, and the conclusion of affinity between the King and Francis. His army will be fit for offence as well as defence, and other princes are intending to help him. Said that Francis would be glad of a suspension of arms, but not of money being given to the enemy. The Germans would wish nothing else than to have money and return home, whence they could return to Italy in twenty days at the Emperor's bidding. Argued with his Holiness for two hours. He showed cold letters from Francis, and said that it was necessary to take a truce for a week while waiting for an answer from Venice. Letters afterwards came from France which satisfied him better, but still he would not decline the negotiations till he heard from the Venetians, whose ambassador says they will not consent to it, and tries to encourage the Pope. Has pressed him about sending mandates. He engages to do as the Venetians do, who have promised Casale's brother to send to France, and, if it pleases the King, to send on to England, for the conclusion of peace there.

ii. "Ex literis, datis 5 Febr."—Alarcon is dangerously wounded in two places by musket balls. Moncada will not go into the camp, and does not meet the Viceroy, because he says he does not wish to break the treaty he made. The Legate has led out all the Papal troops together, and intends to fight if he sees they have courage. The Viceroy has a large force of cavalry, but few guns. The number is not more than 12,000.

The Pope's army are picked men,—6,000 arquebussers and scopetteers,—and say they need no help.

News has come from the marquis of Saluzzo, that the Swiss who were expected for the French have begun to arrive. The news of Russell's arrival has caused the Pope great joy. Hearing that he had come to Savona, sent horses to Civita Vecchia to meet him. Francis writes that as the king of England has offered him his daughter, and he thinks this marriage will benefit Christendom, he intends to send four great personages to England to conclude it. The lanzknechts have agreed to serve for a ducat a-piece, a hat, and a pair of shoes.

His brother Francisco has taken a great booty with the cavalry he had at Lodi. Has presented the King's letter against Luther to the Pope, who received it with great ceremony. The Cardinals and all Rome burn with desire to read it. He has ordered it to be printed, but wishes to keep the one he has received for himself.

Extracts from letters of Gregory Casale, dated 5 Feb.

The Franciscan general and Caesar Fieramosca have come from the Viceroy to treat for an arrangement, and the Pope has made a truce with them for eight days, in order to consult with the Venetians. Afterwards news arrived from France which greatly encouraged the Pope, but he would make no reply till he got the Venetian answer. The signor Vadimonte and Robbadange had arrived with 30,000 scudi. News afterwards came that the Legate and Renzo had joined their forces at five miles from Frosinone. The Viceroy at first would not accept the truce, hoping to obtain Frosinone. Gives an account of the discussion between the Papal and Imperial deputies. Eventually the Imperialists were defeated with great loss, and the Viceroy retired to a rising ground. The Papal forces behaved well under don John [de Medici]. The Pope has thrown the abbot of Farfa into prison for treating with the Viceroy. He is the head of the Orsini faction.

News has come from Fresoloni of the retreat of the Viceroy. The Pope says that he has no intention of conceding the terms insisted on in the late treaty. He is very anxious for peace, and hopes it may be concluded by the means of the King and Wolsey. Robbadange had refused to pay the 30,000 scudi to the Pope, under the supposition that he had arranged a treaty with the Imperialists; but, as I saw that the whole matter was now totally changed, I advised Robbadange to pay them. As to the money brought by Russell, the Pope has bidden him write how much pleased he is with it, and thinks he is restored to life and safety. The Germans are five miles from Piacenza; the Spaniards are reported to be marching on Tuscany.

Roma, die vi. Feb. I should be glad that the truce concluded by you in those parts (istic) should take place for six months, although I doubt whether the Viceroy would consent without a large sum of money. It is not right that the injured should give satisfaction to the injurer. Does not believe that the letters of Ignico will do any good. Suspects the commissions which are said to have been given by the Emperor are merely significant of good intentions and not real, and that the Viceroy has a commission to do what he likes. Begs he will send letters that it may be known to all that the Pope was not averse to honest terms. By so doing we shall gain this at least, that the King and Wolsey may learn that neither the Emperor nor his ministers pay that regard to them which they ought. The Emperor's refusal to be included, except prius alibi conclusum fuerit, induces me to believe that his Majesty would not have been so liberal in appointing the King to be arbiter of the peace, unless he thought he would obtain thereby more favorable terms. I trust, however, that the Emperor, out of dread of the King's hostility, which might prove his destruction, will be compelled to accept peace on the conditions offered by the King and Wolsey. This is the great thing to be wished for by the Pope, who will do whatever they advise, even if it were needful to go into Spain or elsewhere, and not expose himself to every danger. The Pope gives you full powers to do as you please about the conclusion of the truce, as shall seem good to the King and Wolsey, in case we are so pressed that we cannot wait; for although the Viceroy has retreated, yet he has an army entire. There is much fear lest the Spaniards and the Germans should invade T[uscany]. His Holiness has no other means of raising money; and if the 30,000 cr., with the few which have come from France, had not instilled into us a little life, we must have fainted.

terrified with rumors of practices, which are set on foot only to gain time. I am surprised we have kept ourselves afoot so long. Is sorry to hear that the rumor has hurt the Pope's cause in France; perhaps, however, it all arises from the indifference of the French, and the little love they have to this expedition. As to the objection that the Pope had better spend his money in hiring troops than in buying terms of his enemies, Florence will contribute to peace, but nothing to war; and the dread of war has caused people to hide and hoard their money.

Expresses the satisfaction he felt when he first had the happiness of being personally introduced to Wolsey, his thanks for the care Wolsey has taken of his interests, and especially for his late letters, when Campeggio had fallen into some disgrace with the King, for which there was no foundation. Has now been able to throw aside all trouble, and can sleep safe from fear of detraction. Cannot express the delight with which the Consistory heard from the Pope that the King had sent him an ambassador*, who had arrived from Civita Vecchia with a large sum of money, and, in order to display his liberality to the Holy See, had received orders from the King to denounce war against the Viceroy and Bourbon, if they did not forthwith abandon the siege of different cities of the Church. The Chancellor said that the Nuncio also said, “De mandatis non sit scrupulus,” as others can be sent; that there were three obstacles to the peace,—the exclusion of Sforza from the dukedom of Milan, the detention of the French children, and the money due to England. What further was done in this matter the Chancellor did not tell us, except that, as relates to the King's debt, orders had been given for its payment. News has come from Italy, of date 29 Nov., that the Pope meditated flight when the Viceroy entered the port of S. Stephano. The Pope had sent to him the Franciscan general to know whether he would be satisfied with the abstinence of six months; which he declined, unless the Pope would in the meanwhile keep the Emperor's army. Afterwards the archbishop of Capua was sent, and offered pay for the Germans, with no better success. On their first arrival were treated by the Council in accordance with the books and instructions sent them by Wolsey. Since Magnus came have followed his advice, as he told the Council at York it was the King's pleasure he should be obeyed. The Council had determined, as the best means to lessen the charge of my lord of Richmond's household, to discharge a number of his servants, and diminish the wages of others; to which latter step Magnus would not agree till the King's pleasure was known. By his advice, however, 18 persons were discharged, some for offences, and others as superfluous; and now they have received letters from the King to readmit several with greater wages than before. Are much perplexed, especially as they believe the others hope to obtain similar letters for their reinstatement. Though we despatched Christopher† on the 1 Feb., as the Emperor now sends a post with a duplicate of his letter sent by Christopher, and also for a reason we have written to my lord Legate, we have thought best to forward a duplicate of ours. Have warned the King in cipher of some things which seem important. Thinks Christopher must have mistaken the King in saying he was surprised at Lee's slackness in writing, and had heard nothing of the despatch of Echyngham. He was despatched on the 3 Dec. and promised to be with the King in 14 days. Is in agony at not hearing of his arrival; for the Emperor and his Council declared his despatch "was to the full satisfying" of the King's request. The King also says, as reported by Christopher, "that where I pretended that by France was no conveyance of letters, that your said Highness doubteth not but that all that shall be sent to your Highness shall pass in France, so that there be no fraud." Thought so himself, but had no urgent occasion to send a post. What he meant was that at other times he could not get letters conveyed by France either by John Almain or the French ambassadors; for the latter have sometimes sent his letters to St. Lucars or Bilbao to be conveyed by sea, and sometimes have sent their own in his packet to Bilbao to be conveyed to Bayonne, as the passage was stopped on both sides. Has taken 600 ducats for his diets for 100 days ended 26 Nov. This is 5*l.* sterling more than his diets, and he has therefore written to the prior of St. Mary Overeys to add that amount, at the rate of 4*s.* 6*d.* a ducat. Another diet day approaches, and, if Wolsey approves, will take another 600 ducats. Advises him to allow the bishop of Worcester to take his diets from the same money. Sent a bill in cipher in his letter concerning Wolsey's own business, and wishes to know his pleasure, that he and Almaine may attend to it. Asks him to confirm his yearly gift of 2,000 ducats, which Lee has already offered to Almaine. The bishop of Palencia would give four years' pension for the redemption. Told him he hoped Wolsey would live many four years, and that he had not so much need of ready money. Begs him to consider their common letters in cipher. Would write more boldly if he dared to write in the old ciphers, "the wiche I take for damned, because of the war."

By these means he will have escaped from the worst tempest in which the Church has been tossed since the days of Leo. 10 Feb. 2870. ——— to ———

Vit. B. ix. 42. The Pope has received immense consolation in the midst of his dis-
B. M. tress from the liberality of the King and Wolsey. Three times 30,000 crowns would not have encouraged him more than their kind words, bidding him not fear any danger, for whether a universal peace was made, or the Emperor refused it, they would still support him. Sends copy of brief, in which the Pope has faintly endeavored to express his gratitude. The writer himself cannot express the greatness of his joy. The whole college of Cardinals are loud in their praises of Wolsey, and have written him a letter, of which he also sends a copy; and you are to add what further words you think expedient, to express their obligation, both to the King and Cardinal. They have, as it were, restored his Holiness from death to life; for he saw nothing for it before but to submit to the Emperor's discretion, but breathed again at the first news of the money sent by Henry, and was so far emboldened by the arrival of Russell that he has determined, either if peace be made sure, as he hopes, by England, or even if the Emperor oppose it (as I very much fear, considering the news from Spain of which I wrote on the 5th), to take part with the allies. Nothing would do us more good meanwhile than that either here or at Venice we should have credit (faciant creditum) for 100,000 ec. even if they were not actually advanced.

The Pope is particularly pleased at Russell's commission to the Viceroy, and will be delighted if he can obtain a suspension of hostilities without his being called on to pay money or place towns in the King's hands, even if the Emperor do the same. This will give what he most wants, time for England to conclude a peace. But if the Viceroy insists on the iniquitous conditions he demands, he trusts England will still aid him so that he be not compelled to make terms for himself with the Emperor. Perhaps, therefore, Russell will set out again after two or three days' rest; and God grant he may find the Viceroy well disposed. The Pope thinks it not the least of the King and Wolsey's acts of kindness that they have sent a man like Russell on such a mission.

You will receive with this a duplicate of the power I sent you by the last despatch. The Venetians have been written to to send the like. It will be to the great glory of the King and Wolsey if the Emperor and the Venetians be compliant as well as the French king. Some time ago the duke of Ferrara, either dissatisfied with the Imperialists, or seeing that the Pope was supported by such a strong alliance, began treating with his Holiness, who, though the Duke does not offer so large a sum of money as before, has intimated to him that he will accept his terms, viz., give up Modena, contract affinity with him, create his son Cardinal, and himself Captain of the League; for this he formerly offered to pay 200,000 crowns, but now abates it to 50,000.

The Pope has written to Salviati and the Nuncio in France not to relax their efforts for the marriage between Francis and the Princess [Mary].

The insubordination of our fort at Frosinone has given the enemy another day to withdraw in safety. They have gone to Ceperano, Pontecorvo, &c. They were excited by the hope of gain, for Pompey Colonna had told them he would make them masters of Rome. This will protract the war unless Russell has brought some good conclusion from the Viceroy. 20 Papal and Venetian galleys will be sent against Naples, with 2,000 foot, to be commanded by the sieur de Vademonte, brother of the duke of Lorraine, who is ready thus to serve the Pope without any commission from Francis. Of 30,000 [crowns?] sent by Francis, we have scarcely had the use of 10,000; the rest being placed at the disposal of the sieur Renzo, who, though the Pope can hardly afford it, means to raise 5,000 or 6,000 fresh foot for the expedition of Aquila.

Cannot imagine what the Imperialists mean to do in Lombardy. Lately they seemed as if going to Tuscany; now they threaten Placentia. Has no doubt things will turn out better if the French do their duty, but they are wonderfully careless. They kept their fleet idle many months; "et nunc quod esset tempus opportunum aut in Siciliam aut in regnum, non habet aliquam commissionem dendi a Savona, ad hunc modum sunt reliqua ipsorum auxilia." For those Swiss whom they said they were sent to hire were never ordered to come. We have now sent them a messenger either to get them to engage in war, or let us accept the best conditions we can have. You must not think us very greedy, if, in addition to England's liberality, we petition for some additional aid in our necessity.

Despatched Chr. Mores nine days since, 1 Feb., and another man by sea, notifying that as the Emperor had not entered the town on the 22 Jan. we could obtain no audience till the 25th. Worcester explained the King's desire for the tranquillity of Christendom, and asked his assistance therein, wishing his answer on certain particulars which might give the King occasion to mediate for peace and general reunion. The Emperor professed his willingness for peace, but as for the particulars he could make no answer, but if anything reasonable was offered he would declare his intentions. I said he was still a party to the treaty of Madrid, and the King hoped he would mitigate his rigor for the public good. He answered that one Bayard had lately come from France, and that he would hear him and the French resident, or else give them an answer by some other. * A. "Hitherto for this point."

he put in the hands of some one satisfactory to all the confederates. He said it could not be done with justice to the duke of Bourbon. On urging abstinence of war, he said he would be content with a truce for four or five years, but objected to an abstinence for various reasons. Went to the Chancellor in the afternoon, who enlarged on the Emperor's desire for peace, his instructions for that purpose to his ambassadors in England, and that he is ready to treat with the confederates. "And where we said that we thought that afore his time the French king's commission was in England, he said, somewhat smiling after his manner, B."

11 Feb. 2875. SIR GREGORY CASALE and RUSSELL to WOLSEY.

R. O.

I, Russell, arrived at Civita Vecchia on the 4th. Remained a day and a half before I could get horses, although Andrea Doreo did what he could, and accompanied me with certain foot and hand gues. We arrived here the second day after our departure thence, and the Pope sent me a Turkey horse on which he rides himself, with another for Mr. Wyatt, and good horses for my company. These met us twelve miles from Rome. The Datary and other gentlemen met me two miles from the city, and would have lodged me in the palace, but I declined the honor, as the ambassadors of other princes, who came on a like message, were not so lodged. The Datary said the King had done more for the Pope than any other prince ; nevertheless, I went for that night to Sir Gregory de Casale's, who also met me four or five miles outside Rome. Next morning was sent for by the Datary to come to the Pope, and declared to him the good mind borne towards him by the King and Wolsey. The Pope said he was more bound to the King than to any other prince, "and rejoiced more that the king's Highness sent him than though any other prince had sent him 200,000 ducats." The city is also much pleased with this sending, and every one says the King has shown himself a real Defender of the Faith. Thinks he never spent money more to his honor. It is no wonder that the Pope was in great fear, for the Viceroy came in great force, and made as high demands as if he had had the Pope prisoner. Besides it is known that there are 7,000 Spaniards living here.

According to Wolsey's advice his Holiness is sending a commission to his ambassadors in England for the treaty of peace, which he puts entirely in Wolsey's hands, who, he thinks, will regard his honor as his own. If there be no suspension of arms, the Pope says he will prosecute the war bravely, to the utmost of his power. He has sold all his patrimony, and as much as he could sell belonging to the Church. He has also written to Francis for the marriage of my lady Princess, as advised by Wolsey, and told the French ambassador here that if the French king did not consent to the marriage, he would be obliged to make peace with the Emperor. The ambassador has accordingly written to his master, urging him to conclude the match. Russell, according to his instructions, offered to the Pope to go to the Viceroy, and persuade him to a cessation of arms ; but the Viceroy has withdrawn, and the Pope says his men will pursue him, so that he expects the Viceroy will be fain to speak first, for all his brags. Have urged the Datary and the count de Carpi, the French ambassador here, to send 2,000 men, who are now here, with 20 galleys to Terrezyn, which is between him and Gaeta, so as to surround him. The Imperialists have taken prisoner Jeronimo Morron, and made him pay 20,000 ducats for his ransom, then took him prisoner again, and offered to cut off his head if he did not pay 20,000 more. He agreed, and has given his eldest son in hostage.

Finds the Pope conformable to the articles in his instructions, and has delivered him the money. He says he has found what friendship England bears him, by his necessity. The Datary speaks very highly of Wolsey, and rides about the town with Russell for recreation, which he does with no other stranger, and calls himself one of Wolsey's servants. Is marvellously well treated at the palace, where he lies at the Pope's cost. Many Spaniards have been slain at the late conflict, most of whom were circumcised. Signor Ransse arrived here tonight from the camp, and told the Pope that the Viceroy had divided his army among three of the Pope's towns on the confines of Naples, he himself retiring to another, called Pount Corve. Ransse offers to go with 5,000 or 6,000 men towards a city called Laquila, in the country of Brusse, where he has many friends among the inhabitants, and those banished from Naples. From thence he can go on to Naples, and compel the Viceroy to retire. For this he requires 20,000 ducats out of 30,000 which the French king sent by one Roba Dangieu. Meanwhile, the Pope will maintain his army against the Viceroy, in trust of what Russell has told him. He thinks it unnecessary for Russell to go to Bourbon, who can do nothing without the Viceroy, nor the duke of Ferrara either. Russell told the duke of Ferrara's ambassador this day that he had letters from the King to his master, and was commissioned to speak with him, but could not pass through Lombardy on account of the danger of the roads ; that the Duke had better look to his affairs, as the King would be sorry to see him fall into any danger ; and that if he would refer his dispute with the Pope to Henry's arbitration it would be better for him than maintaining it by arms. The Ambassador said that his master had been fain to come to terms with the Emperor, as neither the Pope nor the French king had invited him to enter the League. There have been communications between the Pope and the Ambassador for the delivery of Modena, but they came to nothing. The Ambassador says the Duke would be glad to enter the League, if he could honorably part from the Emperor. Russell told him he might well do so, as the Emperor had not kept all his promises to him. Thinks an end might soon be made between them. He and Sir Gregory have talked to the Pope about it. Has endeavored to find out whom the Pope would like to have the duchy of Milan, and thinks both he and the Venetians are in favor of Francis Forceulx (Sforza). It is said that M. de Vandemont came here to have the Pope's niece, whom the duke of Albany is laboring to get for the king of Scots, and the duke of Ferrara for his son. Russell suggested to Sir Gregory that she would be a meet marriage for my lord of Richmond ; and they both hinted it to the Datary, who thought the Pope would be well inclined to it, though they told him they had no commission to speak about it.

The Pope has been often urged in his necessity to make cardinals, but he would never consent to it, saying they were not his friends who advised him so. Russell, however, spoke to him in favor of the Datary, the Nuncios, and my lord of Worcester ; on which he said that he made no cardinals, but if he should happen to do so, he would be glad to carry out Wolsey's wishes.

Would have arrived at Rome much sooner, but that he lost 13 days at Paris and Savona, as mentioned in his former letters. Rome, 11 Feb. Signed.

R. O. Arrived here on the 6th. Gives an account of his reception, and of his declining to be lodged in the palace for fear of creating jealousy. Lodged with Gregory Casale. Had next day an interview with the Pope, who expressed more joy at what your Highness had sent him than if any other prince had sent him 200,000 ducats. He is in great fear, considering that the Viceroy is coming with a great company, making as high demands as if the Pope were his prisoner. Rance (Renzo) arrived this night from the camp, and intends to go to Brusse. Vandemont's coming was to marry the Pope's niece, but Albany wishes her for the king of Scots. Sir Gregory and I thought her a fit marriage for my lord of Richmond, and so told the Datary. Would be glad of Wolsey's opinion on the subject. Rome, 11 Feb. Signed.

2879. RUSSELL to [WOLSEY].

Has spoken with the Pope for the reformation of Wolsey's bulls. Showed him it was the goodliest college in Christendom; at which he was very glad. Will send the bulls shortly, with Master Dean of Wells' expedition. As to the charge of negligence against Casale, has examined the minutes sent by Wolsey, and finds them full of faults in the names of the churches and dioceses. Has also spoken with the writer, who says he never examined bulls better in his life. He is the best and surest writer of all Italy, and he is much grieved that Wolsey should attribute any fault to him.

Sir Gregory has never been well since he heard of Wolsey's displeasure. He is quite innocent; has done the King great service, "for, and he had not been, as other ambassadors hath showed me here, the Pope's Holiness had made his way long ago; insomuch that at the Viceroy's repair hitherwards the bruit was here that he was the occasion of the Pope's destruction; for that his Holiness did not before make his way with the Emperor."

Was visited by an ambassador from Bourbon, saying that he took Russell for one of the Duke's great friends. I said I had letters from the King and Wolsey, but could not go to him on account of the war in Lombardy; that the King and Wolsey favored him very well, and when he had proved his friends, none would do more for him. Urged him for his own sake to have good peace. Told the man he had something to say to his master, "whereof he should be glad." He replied that Bourbon and the Viceroy would willingly leave it in Russell's hands. "Then I said it was too great a matter for me to meddle withal; notwithstanding, I would move the Pope of it, and see what might be done in it, and that I would do no thing but it should be both for his honor and profit; so that he would not march with his army to tempt no new enterprise." 16 Feb. 2891. EXTRACTS FROM CASALE'S LETTERS.

R. O.

Since the last letters from himself and Russell, the Pope has changed his opinion. He had before intended, to remain with the French and them, but now wishes Russell to go to the Viceroy to bring back the commission he has for treating for a suspension of arms. D. Albertus* and the other French try to prevent this, as they do not think it suitable at present, but advise waiting till the Viceroy proposes it himself, to which he will be compelled by need. Two days after, the Pope signified to him that it should be deferred, and that he would not send Russell, but he would carry on the war vigorously in several places, as he is doing. He has sent 2,000 foot to Tarracina; and D. de Vadimonte is going thither with the galleys to make some attempt on the Neapolitan territory. The Pope was contented that Renzo should spend the money sent by the Christian king on the expedition to Abruzzo. He has sent to take a town called Rokka Papæ, which stopped the supplies of his army.

Russell, on leaving, said to his Holiness that he would not treat for a suspension of arms with the Viceroy alone; but it would be concluded for Lombardy as well, where Bourbon has the upper hand. Russell advised the Pope not to make the suspension, unless the Viceroy would give up a town in Lombardy to be held by the king of England as security for its observance, and the Pope will gladly do the same, though it would be more just for the Imperialists to do it, as they will keep more forces in Lombardy. Does not himself wish for a suspension, for the true way to peace will not be so open as by active war. The sole injury which it will inflict on the Imperialists will be the difficulty, during a suspension, of entertaining so great a body of fresh Germans. They will be able to keep the Germans and Spaniards in Milan and Naples in the customary way, but it will not be so easy with the others.

Letters from Gabriel Csanus, who is staying with Guicciardini at Piacenza, and from others at the same place, say that the marquis of Guaste sent to the prince of Orange four handsome horses, which have been intercepted by Paulus Luciusus. The Prince, enraged at the insult, marched against Piacenza, and was met by the forces of Luciusus, Claudius Rangoni, Ludovico de Fermo, and the marquis of Mantua, who defeated him, and captured captains Zuckarus, Skalange, and Grugnus, 150 horsemen, and 100 arquebuss-men. Claudius Rangoni nearly took prisoner the Prince, who had a horse killed under him.

The Ambassador of the duke of Urbino has lately arrived, and told him all his master says about the war. He says that if the Pope allows them to carry it on, he will be sure to conquer, for the Spaniards and Germans can take no towns, and, if they want to do anything, will be forced to go to Florence, where they will be easily broken up. This message was very distressing to the Pope. Russell and Casale urged him to send a good number of foot to Florence, and to punish those there. If he does this, Bourbon and the Viceroy will not be able to do any damage without a miracle. He seems willing to do it, and Casale's great anxiety is to bring it about. The Pope has ordered nine Florentines who spoke against him to be arrested.

Letters from Bourbon to the Viceroy have been intercepted, asking him to come to an agreement with the Pope as soon as possible, that he may the sooner send money, without which it is impossible to keep the Germans any longer; and asking him whether he wished for two dukes of Milan. Supposes he said this on account of the talk of the division of the duchy, and that each should keep the towns he held. The Pope and the Court derive great consolation from the fact that the King takes his part not only by assisting him, but by advising him, and that Russell has warned the French king that it is time to leave off hunting. The Pope feels safe. The King has surpassed all expectations. Russell left four days ago, but there has been no news from him as yet.

Leaves the reply to his two letters to his ambassadors now going to England, who, he hopes, will express his great and daily obligations to the King and Cardinal. Has news from Venice that the Pope has consented to an eight days' truce in Naples with a view to one for three years, which the Signory refuses to enter, as discreditable to the Pope, and a breach of faith with France. Has called to council the ambassadors of Venice and the duke of Milan, and exposed the dangers of such a truce in presence of the bishop of Bath. Is determined to hold fast by his league with the Venetians, and counteract the designs of the Emperor. The bishop of Bath is writing on this matter to Wolsey. Since writing last has had letters from the marquis of Saluces, dated the 8th and 9th inst., informing him of "la f" of the suspension of arms made by the Pope with the viceroy of Naples for eight days (l'ours). The suspension has had little [effect], for the papal army has raised the siege of Frizolon, and greatly damaged the Viceroy's army, so that it is said to be defeated.

Has seen a letter to this effect from cardinal Trivoulx, legate with the army, to Guichardin, " de sa sainteté, estant à Parmes avec lesdits ma[rquis], " advising the Pope to refuse the terms offered by the Viceroy through Ce[sar] Ferramonsque, and the general of St. Francis, and saying that it would be better to employ the 200,000*er.* which they wish to extort from him, in exterminating the enemy. Desires him to communicate this to the king of [England] and the cardinal of York, and also to inform them that before Piacenza, Captain S and Gigarro, a Burgundian captain, have been taken, and the prince of Orange narrowly escaped. Encloses the Marquis's letter. He must urge the King and Cardinal to send quickly to Rome to support the Pope, for the King's authority and the Cardinal's advice are of much weight. If the war is carried on for a few months, the enemy will be ruined. St. Germain-en-Laye, 18 Feb.

The King wished him to be informed of it, as well as of the victory of his Holiness's army, and he feels sure that by assisting his Holiness in the expences of the war, they will retain him in the League, and thus ruin the enemies of the League. He, therefore, desires the Ambassador, besides what Mons. de Ba[yonne] has written, and also the Papal and Venetian ambassadors, to persuade the King and Cardinal to encourage and assist his Holiness.

"Ex literis Romæ diei vi. et ex curia Christianissimi diei xviii. presentis mensis."

The duke of Urbino had crossed the Po with all his forces, numbering 15,000 foot, 1,400 heavy armed horse, and 2,000 light. The enemy were united, the Germans at Pontenurum, five miles beyond Placentia; the Spaniards near Placentia, at Trebia, eight miles from the German camp. Placentia is well fortified. Count Guido is within. It is supposed the enemy will rather invade Tuscany (Thuscia) or Romandiola. The Germans had not all that time more than two gold pieces and one pair of shoes, but they made no complaint. The duke of Ferrara had given them money, but did not dare to trust himself to them, lest he should be taken, and have to expend his treasures. There is skirmishing about Placentia, in which our side has always come off victorious. The Imperial captains Zuccaro and Scandino have been taken, with 80 horse, and the prince of Orange has had a narrow escape. Victory over the Viceroy. The lord Vademont had arrived with 30,000 [men?]. Russell was in Civita Vecchia, and was expected next day at Rome, where a lodging was made ready for him in the Papal palace.

The abbot of Farfa, of the Orsini family, had been taken and confined in the castle of St. Angelo, for a conspiracy against the Pope. The French king was going to send Langes to Rome on the 19th inst., with 20,000 gold crowns, and promised to send 20,000 more to Peter of Navarre, for 5,000 or 6,000 foot to man the fleet. He had also assigned 50,000 others to the Nuncio in France, "ut possit se de illis valere." He will now follow Wolsey's advice, and reject the practices of the Emperor. "Fere fuit acceptata conditio servitutis propter frigida opera vna Majestatis." The Pope has delayed returning thanks to the King and Wolsey till he should speak with Russell.

"Ex litteris oratoris Veneti apud Chr^m Regem, date (sic) die 18 hujus."

On the 17th, letters came from Italy, dated 8 Feb., from the marquis of Saluzzo to the French king, that on the 4th (?) dom. Renzo de Ceri "liberavit ab obsidione Forolione in qua erat Vicerex," and killed some who were in custody there, on which the Viceroy left the castle "sine pulsatione tubarum." They left some munitions, iron balls and baggage, but took away their guns, though many fled in disorder. The Pope's men pursued. The legate Trivelfi writes from the camp that if the Pope were now to send ten cartloads of breves (curus brevorum) to procure a suspension of arms, he would not be obeyed. The Marquis also writes that the duke of Bourbon (dux Bourbonius), with the Spaniards and lanceknights, went towards Tuscany, "et cum ei appareret pessima via, et quod provium ubique erat, rediere, tentare vellens si Placentiam obtinere possent. Ex Placentia exiit d. Paulus Luzasus (?) cum aliquibus viris bonis et congressere simul, onbe (unde ?) fugaverunt gentes illas, et capti sunt quatuor capita, inter quos est capitaneus Zucarus et Scalengus."

The ambassadors of the French king were to be at Boulogne on the 21st; "et hoc quia Rev. episcopus de Terbe erat indispositus, et mansere per diem Montard" (Montreuil).

The ambassador also writes that he sent me "litteras publicas" on the 16th, and informed me of the provisions made in favor of the League by Francis; which letters have not yet arrived.

Acknowledges that the 50,000 ducats given him by the King (ista Christianissima Majestas) in the late war was the chief cause of his victory, and the recovery of his dominion. Hopes the King will still support him and befriend Italy. Considering his expenses in maintaining armies against France and Scotland, would sooner have taxed his subjects, and mortgaged all his rents for two years, than ask aid of him; but has no other resource. The issue of the war cannot be doubtful, unless it be for want of money. Has written the enclosed letters to the King and Cardinal, whose intercession his correspondent is to bespeak for him.

B. M.

Since writing last has received no letters from Wolsey. Trusts that he now has ample information of the execution done upon English books in Antwerp and Barrow. They will also try the other books sent by Wolsey with the signature of the bishop of London. Wrote to Tuke that Scotch merchants buy these books, and convey them to Edinburgh and St. Andrew's. While he was at Barrow, hearing that the Scotch ships were in Zealand, went thither, hoping to make a fire of the books, but the ships had left a day before his arrival, "so I must a taken patience for all my labor, with lewyng my lady is letters and good instruction with my lord of Bevers and the rent master of concerning the foresaid business."

The margrave of Antwerp and the drossard of Berghes asked to have sent from England a [notifi]cation of particular articles of heresy contained in the said books, so that they might lawfully burn the books, and punish the printers, buyers, and sellers, in body and goods; otherwise they cannot legally do so.

The ambassadors of the king of Bohemia have made their proposition the inst., as privily as possible. Only my Lady, the lords of the Order, and the lord of Palermo were present, and the council chamber was kept by two of her stewards in place of ushers, so that no one could enter. During the making of the proposition by Dr. Fabry, was with the earl of Orthynborogh, called Salamanke. The effect of the proposition is to have aid to resist the attack which the Turk intends to make upon Christendom, beginning with Hungary, and proceeding to Austria, and as far as he can without meeting competent resistance. To this my lord of Palermo answered, that my Lady would communicate with her Council, and give him a reply in three days. The reply has been more secret than the proposition, but Hackett is informed that the Ambassador wished the States of the countries to be assembled at Mechlin, so that they might make a general proposition, ending with a petition of aid from the States. The Emperor or lady Margaret has lately made a petition for 900,000 fl. from Brabant, to be paid in five years, to which consent has not yet been given; but they trust that before Fabry's return from England it will be, and then they will assist him according to the Emperor's pleasure.

Salamanke left here for England on Sunday, with 30 or 32 horses, of which 18 are his, and the remainder belong to gentlemen of Dutchland, who go with him to see the countries at their own expence.

Hochstrate tells Hackett that the King has sent much money with Russell to deliver to the Pope, if the game was coming to his advantage, but not otherwise. He says also that he hears from Dutchland that Wallop has been seen at Venice. Replied that he knew nothing of it, but that it was certain all that the King and Wolsey did was for the peace of Christendom. He answered, that if it were so, he trusted the Emperor knew it, for it was time that Christian princes should take some good conclusion together. Told him that the Emperor has written to lady Margaret that the Pope has written to say that he wishes to come to him in Spain. Hears that Mr. George (Fronsberg), the captain of the Dutchmen in Italy, is as great a Lutheran as may be, and much inclined to displease the Holy Church.

The last publication of gold and silver on Jan. 1, of which he sent Wolsey

Since the last publication, 47,000 marks of bullion have come to Antwerp, and enough cannot be forged to satisfy the commonalty, "for now it is found . . . the third penny of all payments that was wont to go in thy is now but byllen (bullion)."

Has lately received a letter from "mons. le Mr. Hesdynghe, w[ho] is, with the cardinal of Luke, much made of," (neither of whom comes to the court, for the Cardinal will not, and Hesdynghe cannot,) asking to be recommended to Wolsey, and to send news of him. Mechlin, . . . Feb.*

Thanked the steward, and told him that his Grace, who gives him meat, can also give him drink, . . . The post was not sent out last night, as had been intended; for Laurentius Tescanus urged the same arguments as he had used before to Langevais, and created doubts. This day Sanga arrived from the Datary with news that the Viceroy had retreated to Ceperano, and had requested the Legate to send a commissioner. Sanga wishes efforts to be made for peace. Russell and I told them that we would not promise for the King of England to be conservator of it, nor would we urge the King to it, except we had good security on the part of the Pope, "et eorum receptis prius bonis promissionibus bancorum de bona summa pecuniarum vel potius horum munitorum." All the conditions, as I showed, were exclusively favorable to the Emperor. Hereupon the Imperialists were in a rage, and were supported by the archbishop of Capua, who arrogantly affirmed that Russell had assured them he would confirm the arrangement in the name of the King. Urged that no conclusion should be made without consulting the Venetians, who would gladly come to an arrangement on condition that the Viceroy would consent to send away his German troops into Germany, and his Spaniards into Hungary. Two hours were wasted in this dispute. In the end the General agreed with me, and was anxious for a general suspension of arms. We reported all to the Datary, urging him to use his influence with the Pope not to consent to any arrangement absque nostra securitate. Are now going to his Holiness to remonstrate against any arrangement without the French and the Venetians; and we offer, in case that he is pressed for money, that the King and Wolsey shall supply it.

News of various movements in Italy. The mole of Gaeta has been taken by Andrea Doria. The Venetians have laid siege to Cochani. The Pope has promised St. Leo (Sanctum Leum) to the duke of Urbino. Russell will go to Venice to urge a suspension of arms. † In case of necessity, the French and English kings, it was said, would consent to it. As this can now be done with good security, Russell will ask the Venetians to join. The Pope took advice of the archbishop of Capua. He is content to wait until the return of his Legate from the Viceroy.

The messenger sent to the Viceroy has returned to the Legate. The Viceroy has shown him letters from the Emperor, urging him to make peace, and therefore the Legate should not wonder that the war proceeded tardily. This is looked upon as a Neapolitan trick, for he is transporting his artillery across the river. Renzo has come to Rome. Paulus Rozins has told the Pope that the king of France has promised him to move against Navarre in March. The Pope is more inclined than ever to a truce, saying that Laugauls has only brought 20,000 instead of 100,000 scudi. He will, however, forbear till Russell returns from Venice. What he is most moved by is the danger of Florence, and, from his concern to sacrifice all measures to its security, he cannot be moved. He urged that any suspension of arms was considered inexpedient by the king of England without extreme necessity, and there was none such at present.

ii. Letters from the same of the 26 Feb.

On the approach of the Imperialists to St. Don. . . . Guicciardini and Saluzzo retired to Regiana, ten miles from Parma. Count Guido has entered Modena, and we have endeavored to fortify the Pope against this ill news. He told us he had received several letters urging him to a suspension of arms. We told him to remember what Guicciardini and others had written, that Florence was wholly impregnable, especially after it had been fortified after the plans of Peter of Navarre. Combated his fears with various arguments. He says if he is the cause of bringing an army into Tuscany, all his relatives will be banished. For these and other reasons, and the tardiness of aid from France, the Pope is much inclined to an arrangement. Sends information of the conditions between the Pope and Ferramosca, and of an action at Piacenza, in which captains Brandon and Nau were taken.

Found [the Viceroy] in a town of the Pope's called Ciprane, and with him all the great princes of Naples. Declared his commission [urging] him to peace;—that the Emperor was inclined to the same, and had requested the King to interpose in that behalf. He replied he would be glad to do the King as much service as he could; saying further "that the doon Huge Moncale and the general of] St. Francis order had authority to do the same;"—that he had not failed in this respect, but had sent Cesar Feramosca to conclude. I showed the Viceroy that "if he sent in commission to restore the Colloigneiz," or to demand any such sums of money as he had done before, his labour was vain. He urged that the Pope had consented to give 200,000 ducats for the departure of the lanceknights, and the truce of three years. Russell replied that the offer had never been concluded, and asked the Viceroy what answer he had to give to the proposals made to him by the King and Wolsey. He referred them to Feramosca; whereupon Feramosca, who takes the Imperialists' more than the Pope's part, proposed a suspension of arms for twelve months (the Viceroy wished it for three years), omitting all former demands, or any security to the Pope.

"Then Sir Gregory and I went to the Pope to know what he had done, and he showed us of the before rehearsed." We told him it was not the King's mind or Wolsey's that he should conclude the peace alone, nor was it for his honor and profit to do so. On this he sent for the French and Venetians, and endeavoured in vain to induce them to join. He is much urged by the Florentines and the bishop of Capua to conclude the treaty, so that we have been with him three or four days, five or six hours at a time, to oppose their arguments. He complains of poverty, and if he had not been helped by the King, he must have consented to the terms of the Viceroy. He is afraid that Florence will be sacked by the Spaniards and Almains, and make an arrangement without him;—that the duke of Urbino sticks on the other side of the Po, and will not join the French king's army, and now, either from go[ut] or ague, has retired 25 miles from his forces. The Duke asked the Pope for a castle "which Pope Leo did win, and now the Florentines bath it." It is thought that the Duke is discontented, and the Pope said the Duke did not love him, and he was sorry he commanded the Venetian army, for he would do nothing for his profit or safety. Had much ado to prevent the Pope from making this appointment without security.

Have now made the Imperialists give security for 200,000 ducats, but delay it as much as possible, hoping that some arrangement in the meantime may be made in England. For this purpose Russell offered to go to Venice to speak with the Signory and the bishop of Bayeux. When Langiez departed, he promised to return at the end of this month, and bring 100,000 crowns, and the Pope engaged to do nothing till his return. He will also wait for Russell's return, who will endeavour to persuade the Venetians to enter the League, or join the Pope's army effectually. He complains very much of Francis, from whom he has only received 20,000 ducats for two months, and is now behind four or five. He was also to have had 50,000 ducats of the [crusade] levied in France, of which the King gets 300,000 ducats. The Neapolitans are disaffected towards the Imperialists. Rome, 24 Feb. Signed.

1. [The Signory of Venice] to their Ambassador at Rome.

(Headed:)—Oratori in Curia, die 25 Februarii.

We received yesterday your letters of the 19th, 20th, and 21st, informing us that Russell had returned to the Pope with Caesar Ferramosca, and proposed a truce on the conditions contained in the articles, and that his Holiness, contrary to our expectation, was inclined to listen to it. Are much grieved at the intelligence, especially considering the success they have had by sea and land against the Viceroy, and here in Lombardy by the accession of the count Galeas. Believe that Paulus Regius must be with his Holiness, as they understand from their ambassador in France that he left that court on the 13th, having an excellent dispatch from the French king, who is most eager to continue the war, and was going to send Langeais with 20,000 crowns over and above those which he sends in the way of tenth every month to the Pope. Have no doubt that the Pope sees clearly the pious disposition of England both towards the Church and towards Italy, and that he knows well Henry would not fail to send him aid. Are assured by their ambassador that the King and Wolsey are continually urging Francis to help his Holiness and also Italy, which they trust will be benefited by the intended marriage. There need be no fear of Lombardy, and they trust that Tuscany is safe, for they cannot suppose the Imperialists will take that road, otherwise they will be in danger of perishing from hunger, having behind them the allied army, which will pursue them everywhere.

Is to urge the Pope to persevere in the war without fear, and not make peace or truce without the consent of France and England. The Pope knows what expenses they are at by land and sea, yet they were willing to pay half the wages of 7,000 foot, along with the Florentines; and, as they declared in their letters of the 14th, they are ready to shed their own blood in behalf of his Holiness. The expedition cannot fail to have a prosperous issue, if the Pope do but remain steadfast; and in order to keep him so they will give him, notwithstanding their great expenses, 30,000 crowns for these two months, sending one half to Rome next month, and the remainder in April.

by the Pope in the kingdom of Naples, or by the Imperialists in the States of the Church, which shall be restored. All rebellions of vassals to be pardoned, except the intrigues of the Colonnas and their accomplices with don Hugo, and the attack on Rome. Portus Herculis to be restored to Sienna, on their restoring the artillery they have taken to the Church and the Florentines. The Venetians to be at liberty to receive in their ports the armed vessels of allies. The contracting parties to be bound to mutual defence;—the Pope, if necessary, to protect Naples and Sienna with 300 horse of heavy, and 500 of light armour, and 3,000 foot, and the States of the Church and Florentines with 800 heavy and 1,000 light horse, and 6,000 foot. Armies and fleets to be withdrawn on both sides. Free enjoyment of benefices to be permitted to the owners.

If, however, before the terms of this armistice reach England, any negotiations for peace or suspension of hostilities have been concluded by the King and Wolsey, the conclusion made in England is to take precedence of this, and the present conditions regarded as merely supplementary, or, if opposed to the other, as wholly null. The king of England is asked to be protector of this arrangement. The parties to be bound to each other in 200,000 ducats for its observance. The Pope to suspend all interdicts made in consequence of the war, and trade to be free, &c.

Sent a duplicate of the despatch entrusted to Chr. Mores, who left on the 1st. Salcedo, the Queen's servant, returns with a physician, who is right honest, and of a good stock in Biscay, "neither Judæus ne Maranus ne Maurus, which is here rare." It was thought convenient to take him, as he has no wife, and thus avoid seeking for new physicians, "which, if they be good and without spot of evil generation, be hard to get here." He has been in practice eight years. He has practised at Montpellier. Thought this information important, as he is to serve the King as well as the Queen. News has come out out of Italy that the Viceroy with 28,000 men is within six leagues of Rome, and Bourbon has left Milan with 10,000 men. The young Princes are in Alpendo, and it is thought will be had to Segovia. The Empress entered the 22nd, and because she is with child, was carried more than 400 English miles in a litter on men's backs,—eight before, and eight behind.

News is come from don Ferdinand that the Turk intends to return. It is feared he will be joined by Baycer, who has usurped the crown of Hungary. A knight of Prussia sues to the Emperor, declaring that their Grand Master has become a Lutheran, and married the sister of the usurping king of Denmark,—has taken in fee the lands belonging to the Order, and holds them of the king of Poland as his vassal. You see how all things go backwards, and nothing towards the advancement of tranquillity in Christendom; but all proceeds from worse to worse whilst these two Princes are not agreed. Hears that posts still run between the Pope and the Viceroy.

After the taking of Rhodes, the Pope granted Viterbo to the Order as a residence, until some more convenient place could be found. Wished to hold a general chapter, to deliberate about the interests of the religion, but the brethren could not assemble, [on account of the wars,] which were raging everywhere, especially in Italy. Went therefore to the Emperor at Toledo, but was disappointed, and came away with the grants of several privileges, after the making of a peace which would not last. Intended to sail from Bourdeaux to visit the king of England, but was recalled by the Pope to his convent, as the recovery of Rhodes and other matters were to be deliberated upon, "cujus alias R. V. M^{tes} adm quippe obsides hujus rei tenemus," as he will hear from Docray. Returned, therefore, and embarked at Nice in their fleet, which lay at Villafranca, and which was with difficulty preserved from the fleets of the Emperor and king of France. Arrived at last with 70 brethren, and received letters which had been kept for some time at Rome, stating that the King had forbidden the goods of the Order to be carried out of England, and calling all the English knights to serve at Calais. Feels this will set an example to other princes. Begs him not to do so, but to favor them as before. Has received his letters from Greenwich, 14 Jan., and will try to accomplish what he wishes. The Signory [of Venice to their ambassador in England].

"In literis ill. Domini, diei xxvj. Februarii."

Were exceedingly delighted with your letters of 31 Jan., and 4th and 6th Feb., showing how the King and Cardinal persevered in their good offices in behalf of the Holy League, and in supplying the Pope with the money sent by Russell, and how they had urged the French king to take up arms against the Emperor. Contrary to their expectation, their ambassador at Rome informs them, by letters of the 21st, that the Pope was again treating for an armistice with the Emperor, on conditions of which they send a copy,—a thing most inopportune and injurious both to Italy and England. Have accordingly written to their ambassador a letter, of which they send a copy. Have done their best to dissuade his Holiness from this abstinence, and, besides the aid given to him and the Florentines by their army, have now offered him 30,000 crowns, and to pay 7,000 foot along with the Florentines, provided the Pope will adhere to the League. Desire him to represent to the King and Wolsey the great expense they have been at in giving this new aid, and to request them to exhort the Pope to remain constant, and to help him with money.

As to the Spaniards, when they had decamped from Piacenza towards Parma, count Guido Rangone repaired to Modena, and the Venetian Provveditor-General, along with the marquis of Saluzzo, issued out of Parma, and went to Reggio to pursue the enemy wherever he went. The rest of their army is on the Po. Their captain, the duke of Urbino, has been eight days ill of a fever. Count Guasco has gone over from the Emperor to the Pope with 130 horse and 1,200 foot. Are much rejoiced to hear that the French king is sending three ambassadors to England for the conclusion of the marriages. Trust it will lead to a universal peace. When it is concluded the ambassador is to exhibit all those tokens of joy which may express their satisfaction.

Have just received letters from Rome of the 23rd, stating that Russell, VIL.H.IV. 64.

B. M.

As he wrote on the 10th, Russell went in the name of the Pope and of Henry to the Viceroy, who, though he pretended he could not make truce without money being paid for the dismissal of the Germans, showed that he had no small respect for the King's authority, especially since the late unhappy battle, for at the very time Russell returned he sent hither Caesar Feramosca to treat once more; and though at first he made but little concession, his offers now satisfy the Pope. He no longer asks for money or land in security, nor for the restitution of the Colonnas; and the Pope, thinking the opportunity should not be lost, would have concluded a truce by this time but that Russell urged that the Signory's consent should be obtained. The Pope, though afraid of a reverse in Lombardy or Tuscany, did not like to refuse; and Russell went off yesterday to Venice to persuade the Signory to enter it. Has no doubt it will be thought very impolitic in his Holiness to submit now, when Tuscany, which has been threatened by the Germans during the last three months, has not yet been invaded; but, considering the little aid they get from France, and the danger of the Florentines making terms for themselves, he is quite right. Certainly, but for the news of Russell's coming with the 30,000 cr., he would have accepted the far worse terms which Feramosca offered before.

We must acknowledge all our late success is owing to the King, whose money has gained for the Pope those 200,000 [cr.] and the cities with which he was going to have bought the truce, and freed him from the necessity of restoring the Colonnas, which went more against the grain with him than anything else. Of all the thousands spent by the King and Wolsey in behalf of the Holy See this has produced most fruit, and, except a victory, the Pope could desire no better issue than this. Nor does this truce invalidate anything that may have been concluded there (istic) beforehand; for there is a special article to that effect, giving the preference to anything that may have been concluded beforehand by the King and Wolsey. It is agreed besides that England is to promise for the observance of agreements on both sides. But as I know by your letters, and by what Wolsey always told me, that he does not disapprove of a truce, I need hardly defend his Holiness at such length.

Wrote in my last of the conditions offered by the Pope to the duke of Ferrara, which no one doubted he would accept. He has, however, refused, professing at the same time not to have any hostile intentions towards the Pope. We are sure he is soliciting Bourbon to come on, and that the Germans will move. Have heard that they were joined by the Spaniards on the 20th, and were to remove their camp next day, some think to attack Modena, others to invade Tuscany. To add to our misfortunes, the duke of Urbino, who is ill with fever and gout, went first to Casal Major, then to Gazolum; but it is said, if the Pope would give him St. Leo, he would be well and active again. The hope held out to him by Guicciardini is not enough. Thus every one expects concessions from the Pope which no one else will make for nothing.

The King and Wolsey should warn Francis that amid his enjoyment of hunting he should not let the expedition against the heretics drop, but consider that after the ruin of the Papacy his own will be near at hand. If even at the coming of Langaia they had opened their eyes, things would have been in better state. Has no doubt the intentions of Francis are good, and that he does not desire a victory, but regrets that he has not learned from past calamities to be more careful about the present than about former expeditions. Have warned him thousands of times, yet the French take no heed, believing, as Henry very well said, that they can afterwards raise the dead. You know what urgency we had to use about the war beyond the mountains, and I am sure the Pope would not have concluded the league without that article; for if the Emperor was attacked only in Italy, he could send thither as many troops as he pleased from Spain and Germany.

The Pope is not less magnanimous now than when he was a cardinal, but cannot expose his person to the same dangers when the fate of the Church, of Italy and of Christendom is bound up with his. If he falls the Church and Italy will fall with him; otherwise he would sacrifice himself willingly. He has good reason for fearing the fate of Florence. There has already been a conspiracy there in favor of the Germans.

The act of the Imperial minister in presenting the letters for a council was wanting in modesty. They contained a reply to a brief of the Pope modestly complaining of his treatment, and in the end they concluded that, as there was no suitable judge between the Pope and the Emperor, a council should be held, not mentioning where. It is true that Pompey Colonna appealed to a council at Spire, but the Pope does not care for the words of a madman. The brief was sent into Spain to the Nuncio, and next day letters were sent him that he should not present it, but use it only for his instructions. The letter did not come in time, so the brief was presented. The Emperor was willing to observe the same moderation (eundem modum); for in another letter, dated the next day, he said he wished to be a good son of the Church, and not speak of a council. I hope the indignation felt by the King and Wolsey on that head will be of service when it comes to the ears of the Emperor. The Pope thanks him. He is expecting with great anxiety a matrimonial alliance between the kings of France and England, as the peace of Christendom depends upon it. Francis was frequently advised about raising up some rival to the Emperor among the princes of Germany, in which the dukes of Bavaria could be employed. On this point Francis had some negotiations with the Count Palatine, but we don't know what has become of it. The king of England wishes to interpose. These dukes are powerful; and in this matter, and in favoring the new king of Hungary, the King and Wolsey have great influence. If the Archduke attempts the expedition he has in hand, it may produce great trouble, and drive the Waywode to an alliance with the Turk; but in this matter it is necessary to strike at once, and not spare cost.

Are somewhat alarmed at the loan expected from Spain by the Emperor. The advice of burning the fleet when it arrived was impracticable. The duke of Ferrara would ridicule the proposition to make him king of Naples. Aquila has revolted to the Pope. Renzo has given orders for raising 3,000 foot. News of various unimportant movements in Italy.

The Pope is sorry to hear of Russell's accident, and that he cannot go to Venice. Does not think the accident serious.

Feramosca left yesterday. He does not think the Viceroy will comply with the terms. We are in great difficulties about provisions for the troops. Triulsi has written to say they have been three days without bread, and deserters are numerous.

Suggest to Wolsey to send his aid in time, and the money that Russell promised if the Pope did not comply with the conditions offered. The French fleet is on the rocks at Savona, and Peter Navarro cannot leave it. We shall be obliged, therefore, to work a miracle with five barley loaves and two small fishes.

St. P. vi. 566.

Wolsey will know from his last letters what good Russell's arrival in Italy has done, and how it has confirmed the Pope. Hears from Rome that his Holiness has sent Russell to the Viceroy to treat of the truce which the King and Wolsey desired. The Viceroy, however, would not retreat from his first demands about the money, the security, and the restoration of the Colonius, as Wolsey will see more fully in his brother's letters, which he sends to Mr. Peter (Vannes). Soon after the Viceroy sent Caesar Feramosca to the Pope: and he, passing over the above demands, gave the Pope a blank sheet, on which the latter wrote his demands, and made an agreement with him, but it has not yet been confirmed or signed. Venice was distressed at this.

Went to the Senate to ask how certain they were of it, and found that they had received the same news as he had. They told him they feared the matter would soon be settled, if it was not now; and they wondered that, now the affairs of the allies were so prosperous, the English ambassadors should arrange a suspension of arms, for they heard that it was Russell who had gone to the Pope to do so. Told them that his brother and Russell had procured this with the consent of the French king and the Venetians, and they ought all to agree about it. Quieted them thus, and advised them to try and keep the Pope from joining this particular convention, and to order their troops to advance to oppose the Germans; for whenever Florence is safe, the Pope is not so eager for a composition. They promised, and ordered their general, Urbino being ill, to move the camp, and make what attempts were necessary.

Yesterday, in consilio Regatorum, it was decreed to write to the Pope to dissuade him from joining, as it would spoil everything; and the last letters from France state that Mons. Langeais had been dispatched by the King with money, and the Pope ought to recollect Henry's offers of help. They will pay him 30,000 cr. to enable him to resist the enemy, and will do all they can to keep him from this step, which would ruin the whole world. Sends letters he has just received from his brother. The Lords here fear that the next letters will say that the Pope has signed the agreement; and they suspect the English ambassadors of having promoted it, which is not the case. Russell is coming here, and will explain to them his charge. Hopes matters will turn out well. If not, will act so that they may see they are the cause, and not the King or Wolsey. Will protract the matter, and keep the Pope in the right way as much as possible, and will write of his success by the next courier. Venice, 26 Feb. 1527. Signed.

It is said that Malatesta will go on with the Venetian troops if the duke of Urbino's illness continue. The writer, along with the French and Venetian ambassadors, has remonstrated with the Pope on his unreasonable fears, showing that the enemy, if they went on, would not find one town friendly, while the allies now number 25,000 foot and a large number of horse; that the Imperialists relied on the duke of Ferrara for money, which he will not give unless Modena is taken, and that is impregnable; and that the Duke is inclined to listen to the Pope's terms. The Pope spoke of the complaints of the Florentines, which proceed only from Philip Strozzi, and "necessitatem Fresoloni, de qua diximus esse tacendum et ei occurrendum, quoniam ex negligentia acerbisset." Expect "provisiones" from the Venetians, especially about Lombardy, which may put the Pope out of all fear. The Pope promised to wait till Russell's return, unless he was compelled, i.e., unless the Imperialists invaded Tuscany.

The Pope has just told Renzo to go on boldly, and he will make no peace if he get help elsewhere. The whole court is delighted that he has been kept from concluding this truce.

Asks him to excuse the attendance of Sir Edw. Croft, one of this council, who is summoned to account for the sheriffwick of Hertfordshire for the year ending at Michaelmas last. He has been much absent by his attendance at this council, and his deputy, Thos. Havard, can best answer therein. The King has ordered Crofte and others of the Council to take a journey for the good order of the Marches, from the end of this week till about the beginning of March. Beaud[ley], . . . , 18 Hen. Arrangement between Francis I. and the Venetians for carrying on the war in Italy; consisting of 17 articles.

It is agreed that 30,000 Swiss, Germans, French, and Italians shall be kept in pay, comprehending the foot serving under the marquis of Saluzzo. The month to commence on May 15. Arrangements for the pay on both sides.

Efforts shall be made to induce the duke of Ferrara to join the league; in which event he shall be appointed generalissimo. Francis duke of Milan to contribute, if possible. Money to be sent to Renzo, if desirable, to carry on the war in the Neapolitan territory. Arrangements for the fleet under the command of Peter of Navarre. Neither party to make terms with the Emperor apart. Liberty to be granted to the king of England to act as mediator. Nothing in this treaty to affect the former league, as regards Henry VIII. and the Cardinal.

Vit. B. ix. 71.

"Ex literis D. Gregorii ad Pro[thonotarium] xxvj. Februarii datis."

Russell is staying at Narni, owing to an accident. He has been ordered by the Pope to send on to Gambara his instructions and letters. Urges him with all diligence to press the Signory to send a good answer. The Florentines must have regard to the general safety. The Pope wishes him also to go to Ferrara with the King's letters, and exhort the Duke for the King's sake not to aid the Imperialists. Caesar Feramosca has returned to the Viceroy to report what had been done, "et ut etiam adferret propriam voluntatem quam Vicerex habet a Casare, quo examine[tur] utrum bene sit; dixit Feramosca se rediturum, sed secrete indignatus aliis dixit se non rediturum."

ii. "Ex literis a D. Prothon. Casale die ij. Martii Venetiis datis."

Russell has sent Wynt to him with his letters. Went with Wynt this morning to these lords (the Venetian council). Declared everything to them at length; when, as usual, they took time to answer, although it is quite well known that they will not agree to any truce without the consent of the French. They will, however, allow their forces to go in aid of the Pope, and have determined to send him 30,000 crowns, both for these new provisions, and in consequence of the news from Rome since Russell left. Will send their answer when he gets it, and go to Ferrara if need be. Does not require to go to Florence, as he has done everything with the Florentine ambassador. Means to press the Signory to carry on the war with vigor, that they may not give the Pope occasion to make truce. The French seem much dissatisfied with this suspension of arms, which, [they say,] is tantamount to Italy being taken from them. The lanceknights are determined to go on, but whether to Lombardy or Florence is not known.

2032. [HERMAN RYNGK to HENRY VIII.]

Trusts that the King already knows that he has fulfilled his orders. Has sent to the King a barrel of powdered wild boar venison from the bishop of Cologne, and also six barrels of preserved lampreys, such as the Emperor Maximilian had from him every Lent. It has been prepared only by his wife and daughters.

The archduke Ferdinand, who is crowned king of Bohemia, and writes himself king of Hungary, has sent hither for men and powder to be at Vienna on St. George's day. It is thought that if they wait for the diet to be held at Ravensberghe, the Turk might have entered so far as to endanger Hungary and the neighbouring realms. Thinks Ferdinand has written likewise to other lords and cities of the Empire. The messenger has today gone to Thistildorp (Düsseldorf), where the duke of Saxony marries the eldest daughter of the duke of Gulycke. Thinks that they will come hither in a few days, at the desire of the bishop of Cologne. Cologne, anno 27, 2 March.

ii. 127.

Hopes Wolsey is informed what answer the King may have received to the two packets about Luther, which he was directed to convey to the cardinal of Mayence, and duke George of Saxony. Was glad to be employed in a matter so much to the King's honor. Sent him lately a barrel of powdered venison of the wild boar from the bishop of Cologne, with two small barrels from himself of a viand used among the lords here, and which he used to prepare against Lent for the late emperor Maximilian. It has been dressed by his wife and daughters. The archduke Ferdinand, now crowned king of Bohemia, who calls himself king also of Hungary, has sent hither two persons, of whom one has fallen sick by the way, to desire immediate aid in horse, foot and gunpowder, to be sent to Vienna by St. George's day, to abide the diet which is to be at half Lent, at Ravensberghe in Austria. The Turk is preparing to invade with a much bigger power than ever, and having already greatly wasted Hungary, and laid upwards of 40,000 men in garrison upon the Borders, might endanger greatly the neighbouring countries. The messenger is gone to Thistildorp, five leagues hence, belonging to the duke of Gulycke, where they are in great triumph for the marriage of the duke of Saxony to Gulleke's eldest daughter; and it is thought both Dukes will come shortly to Cologne at the request of the bishop of Cologne. Thos. Tichytt, who was Wallop's secretary, has been more than two months sick at Covalenste (Coblentz), and has come here to seek remedy after being at great cost for medicines. Has somewhat relieved him. Thinks, when he is able for it, he should go to Wallop; but he is not fit to travel yet, especially that way. Will have to aid him with money, else he will go home; but Ryngck will not see him back for a month or six weeks. Cologne, 2 March 1527. Signed.

R.O.

Received his letter on the last day of Feb. from Mr. Geffray, by Nic. Helcroft, Mr. Farrington's servant, to whom he delivered the writs contained in the said letter. His friends are glad to hear of his wise conveyance. It is reported in Ingleton that he has escaped the dangers of attachments, and of those who were appointed to watch the Sanctuary at Westminster, and that he will now be able to enjoy his goods and lands. Advises him to make answer before the King's council as soon as possible. My Lord has sent Ric. Cowpland to occupy the demaynes of Tateham, and in my lord Cardinal's name has discharged Mr. Hussie, priest. A letter of credence has come to every servant of my Lord, except the writer. Two days before, the said priest had set the said demesnes to Mr. Curwen and Mr. Morley, and they will not leave without letters from the King or Wolsey. Kitboud has, therefore, ridden up for new writings.

Have sent "your" gown furred with fownes, and the indenture you left for the ordering of my Lord's goods, and the benefice of Mellyng. It is said here that my Lord has been told that Banks broke with you, and would not allow you to take my Lord's goods to pay your debts. Advises him to send this writing to my Lord by Sir Alexander, and ask his Lordship to write, for proof of his true dealing, to Mr. Edward, Mr. Morley, Oliver Thompson, and Robt. Croft, who can tell him in whom is the default of good order, and the cause that his father's will is not performed. Advises him to put matters straight as soon as possible. Cowpland meddles with and sells "quick goods." Before leaving for London he sold twenty stotts, and now he has sold two more.

Advises him and Mr. Hussie to send parson Trowdes to Hornby to take a view of my Lord's apparel, &c.

Wishes him to keep this letter to himself. Tateham, 2 March.

" that the Florenty[n]es

grau[n] ducats over and above such sums the Pope should pay." During these negotiations between the Viceroy and Florence, Bourbon gave them fair words, pretending to be ready to conform, but he still marched nearer to the city. By intercepted letters it is now clear that he and the Viceroy meant to keep the city in hope, and thus take it unprovided, spoil it and burn it. The Florentines intend to defend themselves, and will endanger their lives and goods, rather than be at the discrea[tion of the lance]knights, Spaniards and other ad[venturers].

The Pope's ambassador wishes to go to the King to further the Florentines' petition. The King has been "accrasyd" this four days, and today took a purgation, so that Clerk has seen neither him nor my Lady. Robertet tells him that the King and Council advise that Florence should enter this late league with Venice, and a commission for that purpose had been sent to the marquis of Saluze; he would grant wheat and the other aid they demanded; "knowing right well of wh

Sent letters by way of Lyons, on the 2 March, signifying the Emperor's answer touching Mendosa's strange behaviour, so contrary to your expectation and the Emperor's letters. Is much abashed, as he had written so often of the Emperor's towardness. Does not understand what Mendosa means by keeping himself so covered. Is told that the Emperor and the Chancellor did not receive Echyngham's despatch, but only mandatum, wherein they deceived me, as it was promised that Echyngham should carry secret instructions, albeit, as John Almain says, that counsel was afterwards changed, of which change they showed me nothing. Thinks that some crafty point was played in France, of which they have written in their cipher. They asserted that the King is by this time satisfied, for on the day of the departure of Mendosa's courier, Chateane had arrived and met him at Richmond. Cannot understand this, for Richmond is not on their road. They continue to affirm they will content your Highness. The King has more sure news of Italy than they have, as they learn by the Cardinal's letters. News has come

Has, according to instructions, showed to the Emperor the strange answer made by Inigo at his first audience, and urged him, on your behalf, as one desirous of a perfect amity between the two crowns, to show some demonstration of the love and trust he has to the king of England. The Emperor replied that he was aware how much he owed to the king of England, and would show obedience to him, not only now but evermore. Finds a difficulty in transmitting Wolsey's money, as the merchants complain that their traffic here is of little profit, and gold is risen in England. Have partly answered his letters of the 19 Jan. by theirs of the 2 March. Arrangements have been made that they shall come to the hands of the bishop of Bath. Sends the effect of them in cipher.

Have followed his instructions in all matters for inducing the Emperor, by good and comfortable words, to have the peace discussed in England. Showed the King's good mind to the Emperor, and desires to secure his interests, but without much effect. Found him altered, probably owing to his ambassador in England, although he says he has received no letters from him. The Emperor stated that the King would be satisfied on the arrival of instructions by the last courier. He added that he would peruse the letters of his ambassador, and then give us his resolution. We told him that this did not correspond with his former announcements of his ambassador having received instructions, and that the King and Wolsey were somewhat perplexed. He said, perhaps it was owing to his ambassador being too importunately pressed. We replied that was not the case in England. On our saying that we would return another day, and disclose the rest of our commission, he was very urgent we should do it then. To avoid his displeasure we complied, omitting certain things as less agreeable. Spoke about a defensive league, to which he seemed to give his assent, especially after the publication of this new league,—an innuendo to which we did not think fit to make a reply. Went from him to the Chancellor. Gives an account of his interview with the Italian ambassadors, and the entry of Henry into the League. The Papal ambassador is of opinion that the Emperor desires peace. He knows the commission has been sent to the Imperial ambassador to offer the French children to the king of England.

As the Emperor had not seen don Inigo's letters, he refused to appoint a further-audience for the present. Went to the Chancellor on the 2 March, who made us a similar excuse. When I avowed that he was content that instructions should be sent by Echyngham, and reminded him that Allemen had asked two days to copy them, he said it was a mistake. He then added that Chateau had by this time arrived in England with secret instructions and new ciphers, and the King would be satisfied. He promised to let us have our answer with speed, and begged us to dine with him on the morrow. Were with him about 9 o'clock, when he said that he was ordered to make answer to that we had proposed to the Emperor on the last of February. He told us that, when Mendoza was greatly urged by Wolsey, he did not like to admit he had no instructions; and, being very much perplexed what answer to give, at length made the admission, to gain time, that he had received instructions, but no decipher. He excused the Emperor for being unwilling to take an abstinence of a few months, considering the number and expense of his army; but he would be content with one of three years, and a general combination against the Turks. He denied that Francis Sforza had any title to Milan; and if he were proved unworthy of it, it was given to Bourbon, who had waived his right to the queen of Portugal in favor of the French king. Made objections to the judges to try the case, as being chosen by the Emperor, telling him that the Emperor had promised the Pope, by the general of the Observants, that, if the Emperor chose one, the other party should choose the other. As to our proposal that the duchy should be placed in the hands of an indifferent prince, he insisted on the difficulties of the case, and the great expense it would involve if Henry undertook it, and said that he did not consider that the king of England was much bent upon this, provided that peace could be secured in any other way. The French king, he said, could no way excuse himself; for if it be impossible to restore Burgundy, it is not impossible for him to return hither as prisoner again, as he promised to do in that case; and they can show letters of his own hand to the Emperor, since he was liberated, stating that, though he did not confirm the treaty, because the peers of France would not consent to it, yet, as Burgundy was in his hands, he would keep his promise. His protest, if made, was not published in time. Besides, he said, the Emperor's ambassador had power to treat with Francis on the conditions the latter had himself offered to the Viceroy, or even to descend lower;—that he had the most ample authority for proceeding in a way that no one suspected. And when we asked him what part would be assigned in the negotiations to the king of England, he said that full instructions had been sent on that head to the Imperial ambassador; but what they were, neither the Chancellor nor Allemen would inform us. On our complaining that the money was not yet paid, and that the delay was not honorable to the Emperor, they assured us that, if the King were not satisfied in one way, he should be in another, and that he had terms to propose, of which we know nothing. Suppose they are the same as those mentioned in the last letters.

In this interview the Chancellor told us he had seen letters in which it was stated that the bishop of Tarbes and the Great President were expected in England to treat of a marriage between Francis and the princess Mary, and we had asked Bauloyne as security. "He will not hesitate to offer," said he, "a large sum of money." When we bade him

He insisted on the right of England to France. "And what if we offer you," said Alemann, "Gascony, Guienne and Normandy?" "And what," said I, the Almoner, "seeing that you solemnly swore, at our first coming into Spain, that you would attack France, and never retrace your steps until you had placed its crown on our King's head?" He palliated this, saying it was not in the treaty, &c.; adding there was no real dispute between England and the house of Burgundy, both of whom were interested in despoiling France. In reply to a remark of Alemann that we were safe so long as Flanders was friendly, we said that it had more need of us than we of it, and that it had grown wealthy by our friendship. Hear that De Praet is going into Flanders. Urged that he might visit England. Pressed this, that it might appear that the Emperor was anxious to please the King. But they excused it, saying that the Spaniards were proud and haughty, and don Inigo might resent it, and consider himself affronted. Rebutted this objection, and remonstrated with them on the report that one was already at Bilboa to be sent to England, and they had not been told of it. They excused it on the ground that it had been decreed that he should be sent privately. Leave it to Wolsey's judgment.

The bishop of Bath has written to Brian Tuke, and Tuke to me the Almoner, of one Matthew, companion of the courier who took Echyngham from Bourdeaux to Clerk, and has been thrown into prison. Thinks this Matthew has abstracted certain letters, of which he has written more to Tuke.

Were summoned to the Emperor on the 4th Feb., when Worcester proposed to have an abstinence of war, with a view to a solid peace, and more speedy payment of the King's debts than was offered by don Inigo, according to his promise. He consented to a truce for four years, but not of a few days. For the other, he said, he wanted more money than he was able to find, he was so pressed by his enemies; and he trusted the King would not distress him. He was answered that, if it were reasonable to distress his enemies, it was equally reasonable the King's debts should be paid, and not have to wait till his wars were over. When we urged that a particular league, as proposed by Inigo, could not well be had in a time when they were treating for universal peace, his Majesty answered, he saw it was done elsewhere, and, smiling, said, "Why may not the King treat with me now, as he did with the French king when he was under my hands?" He expressed his hope that Inigo had declared his instructions, and that you would be content with them. We took our leaves, assuring him that his honor and his interests were safe in the King's hands. Valladolid, 7 March 1527. Signed.

The Chancellor shuffled in excusing the sending a messenger with secret despatches to the Emperor's ambassador in England. Cannot guess the reason, except that he is alarmed at the advancement of the negotiations with France. The courier used great caution, and the Emperor assured us that he had not for a long time received letters from his ambassador in England, which is incredible, and irreconcilable with his own words and those of Alemana. On complaining of these proceedings were told it was not fit that everything should be communicated to them. Details the conversation they had upon this point. The Chancellor, in the end, promised them, but somewhat coldly, to send a duplicate of these instructions to Inigo. He urged that an abstinence would be injurious to the Emperor, and even if he consented, perhaps some of his captains would not, but one of them would make himself captain "de Ventura." Offers his conjectures upon this point. The Chancellor defended the Emperor's proceedings touching Milan, and insisted that the Duke's judges should be chosen by the Emperor.—The refractoriness of the Spanish Cortes.

Gives an account of their conversation with the Emperor touching the abstinence and the King's money, to the same effect as in previous letters. On the latter point he spoke more coldly than the Chancellor, so that I cannot believe that don Inigo has any more satisfactory proposals to make than he has offered already. I do not think they are likely to pay, and when I urged that it was only honorable that each prince should have his own, and that the King might want his money, and about the treaty (as in our previous letters), he said, when he was at Toledo not much respect was paid to treaties when the king of England negotiated with the king of France without advising him of his intentions. Details his conversation on this point. The Emperor was not satisfied with their argument. Announces the arrival of the messenger who had been sent to don Inigo long before the last. Orders have been given by the Emperor for the construction of 60 galleys at Barcelona, Genoa, and elsewhere. The Emperor enters the Cortes, summoned for grants of money, which is very unusual. Various intrigues were set on foot, but no supplies have been granted.

The Emperor is content to come to Italy to receive the crown, with 3,000 persons, and will return immediately to Germany, where he will do all he can to compose the Lutheran disturbance, but will not allow a council to be proposed, as he at first wished, because he thinks it would rather produce confusion against the Pope than promote the service of God. He promises also to settle his variances with Venice. He will refer to two judges, to be elected by himself and the Pope, the case of the duke of Milan. If he is to be deprived he wishes to invest the duke of Bourbon. He offers to raise an army in Italy, asking for help from the Pope and Signory, and he thinks the Pope's share would be 150,000, but in this there would not be much difficulty. He says the French king has offered 2,000,000 for the redemption of his sons, which he would not accept, but he will now, to please the Pope and to ensure peace. His differences with the king of England he holds in

"Litteræ nuntii apud Christianissimum."

Since he wrote on the 5th has had letters of the 19th from Venice, stating that the Signory had promised our Florentine ambassador, lately sent thither, not only free passage for the duke of Urbino into Tuscany, in case it should be invaded by the Imperialists, but a levy of 7,000 foot additional, at the joint expence of the two republics. Our men of Piacenza had taken a castle, with about 70 prisoners, including captain Ortega and dom. Perco, a kinsman of Bourbon. Our troops are victorious in every engagement.

Was much alarmed by his correspondent's letters of the 6th, and others of the 5th, received this morning. Would have gone at once to the bishop of Bath, but he had already heard the news, and was with the King. He found Francis and the Lords exceedingly well inclined. 2959. FERDINAND KING OF THE ROMANS to HENRY VIII.

Received gladly the charge of his ambassador. Encloses a copy of his reply, from which the King will see his title to the crown of Hungary since the death of king Lewis, and that the count of Scepusse, the waywode of Transylvania, has most unjustly invaded the kingdom, and occupied as much of it as he could, to its great injury. He refused to succor Nandoralla (Belgrade) when besieged by the Turks, and sent no forces to assist the King. The loss of that town gave the Turk free access to Hungary and other Christian countries. He similarly delayed to send his forces to assist king Lewis at Mohatsch. If he had not acted thus, Buda would have been safe, and the King alive. His sole object has been to attain the crown. He caused himself to be crowned, notwithstanding the hereditary rights which Ferdinand has through his wife. Unless he be put down shortly, his example will be dangerous to other princes. He is quite unable to protect Hungary from the Turk, but must either surrender it or make a disgraceful peace, for what Christian prince will help such a usurper? Ferdinand, on the other hand, has an undoubtedly lawful title to the kingdom, and can protect it, with the help of Austria, Styria, and Bohemia, his hereditary dominions, and the Emperor his brother. Asks the King to assist him in defending his rights, and to order his ambassador to communicate his charge to him, and recognize him as king of Hungary, that they may consult about resisting the common enemy. 2960. SIR JOHN WALLOP to WOLSEY.

Wrote last on Jan. 12 from Augsburg. Came hither four days before the King made his entry, which was Feb. 3. Met him at his desire four miles out of the city. He sent the count of Saulin and his uncle to tell Wallop not to declare his commission at that time. Presented him the King's letters, and, after asking after the King, he told Wallop to ride with the Pope's ambassador, who was next to him and the Queen. As he approached the city he was met by divers nobles, by the Jews, who met him with procession and singing, by the clergy, and last by the burgesses. There were in all 5,000 horsemen. He, with the Queen and all their folks, rode in black. He went through the city to the castle, and then to the cathedral church, where they made their offerings. Went to him three or four days after, and found all the noblemen with him. Gave him the King's letters, which were openly read and praised, and then declared his commission. He called together his council for some time, and then thanked the King, and said he would give an answer shortly. Dined alone with him on Sunday. The same day he sent to Wallop's lodging a cartload of wine, a hart, an ox, 50 capons, and a cartload of eels. After dinner he told him how untruly the Wayda served the king of Hungary at the battle, with the intent to make himself king; showed him his own title by his wife, and of the contr[act] by which, if the late King died without issue, the crown should go to the house of Austria; said that whereas Wallop was sent to aid the Wayda against the Turk, he did not believe he had any intention of attacking him, but would rather take his part, and if he would do so he had not the power, and he trusted the King would never help the Wayda against the Emperor or himself. He would give no answer yet, until he had consulted his council.

"The 21 day of Feb. he sent [to] me, saying I should [have an a]nswer incontinent in Latin, prying me to take patience till his cou[n]cil were [met. I prayed his G]race that I might have it in French or in Spanish for th his Grace said that it should be openly noblemen of Bem (Bohemia) in Latin, and afterward he would give me my answer in French; and incontinently afore [the no]belmen the ambassador of Hungary, who is here for them of Hungary that be the king of Beme's friends, [did d]eclare to me my answer," which he encloses. Dined with him and the Queen. After dinner the King called him apart, and said that as his letters were to the propugnator of Hungary, or king, if any such be, he should deliver them to him, for he would take upon himself to be propugnator, and was the right king; the other was a false traitor, and betrayed his master for the sake of the crown; and he trusts the King will assist him, for he was ready to defend his country against the Turk all the last year. Told him that his commission was to him that was elected king and propugnator, living in the country of Transylvania, and he would deliver the King's letters to none other. Told him that there was nothing in the commission that could be prejudicial to him, for it was only to give aid to the defence of Hungary against the Turks; that the King would not support anything against the right or interest of the Emperor or Ferdinand, or any other person, but only succor the present calamity of the kingdom. Asked for leave to go to Hungary; at which Ferdinand, being stirred with choler, said that if he went the king of England would do a great displeasure to the Emperor and to him; he was sure that if the King knew the truth Wallop would go no further: he trusted that the King would help [him not only to make war upon the Turk, but also to gain Hungary; and he desired him to send one of his servants to the King in post, for he might have an answer in a month.

Answered, that if he stopped him the King would consider it unkind, for neither he nor the Emperor had any reason to mistrust his Highness, and spoke of the labor made to induce the King to enter the League. His Grace said he might do as he pleased, but he should have no other answer. Asked respite for a day or two. On consideration, durst not take upon him to go farther without knowing the King's pleasure, as there is nothing being done against the Turk in Hungary. The Turk is now only fortifying what he has gained, and the Wayda allows him to do so, "wherefore I c[an see li]ke to go thither without it were to advance the King's highness ma[tters, which I can do here] as well as thoug[h I] were there, for I have caused r Luter[s] causes to write to the Pope's ambassador that is in Hungary of my being here." Has promised the king of Bohemia not to proceed till he hears from the King.

The King was crowned on Feb. 24, and the Queen on the 25th, followed by jousts and tourneys for two or three days. News has come that Constantyn, a captain of the king of Poland, has killed 20,000 Tartars, and taken one of the Emperor's sons. The king of Poland has peace with the Muscovites for seven years. The King's answer to Luther is in print throughout the country. Hears that it has been seen in print at Trent. The Pope's ambassador and the bishop of Trent say it is the best answer they ever saw or heard of. It is said that the Turk intends to besiege certain Venetian towns in Dalmatia. By the end of May it will be known what way he will take. Wishes to know what to do if he does not come. Will want money if he stays longer than August. Trusts that if the Turk comes the bill of exchange will be ready, or else they will judge the worst, for news has come that the King has sent a great sum to the Pope. An ambassador of Poland has come to negotiate between the king of Bohemia and the king of Hungary. A Russian ambassador is also here. Will deliver to them the letters for their kings. Writes this letter apart for his servant to carry privily out of the packet, lest he is searched by the way. The king of Hungary sent a letter secretly by his secretary to know whether Wallop was sent to him or not; in answer to which he wrote to say that he was sent to him, but that he was stopped by the king of Bem (Bohemia), and had written to the King and Wolsey to know their pleasure. Asked divers questions of his servant, and showed him what reports were made by his master of his untruth; to the which he answered that more was reported than was true.

As far as Wallop can see, the Hungarians of the king of Beme's party have little power; they have neither town nor castle, and are fain to dwell at Presburg where the queen of Hungary is. If the king of Beme makes war, the king of Hungary will be obliged to make peace with the Turk, and ask his aid, which he is quite sure of obtaining, but he says he will not make peace unless compelled.

Does not think the king of Beme can make war, for he was obliged to take away the jewels in all his churches in Ostryge and Teroll, to pay for his coronation, at which the people grudged sore. The noblemen of Almain are not likely to aid him in conquering Hungary, for they think he has too much already. The Electors have sent an ambassador to the king of Hungary, and he has sent or will send one to them. All the noblemen disdain him, except the two brethren of the marquis of Branbroke who were with him at his coronation. Salamanka's going to England, of which Wallop wrote, was feigned, that he might pass through the country more safely, for the Almaines love the King's highness more than either the Emperor or his brother.

The further Wallop goes, the better he is treated, especially in Bavaria, where dwell dukes William and Lodowick and the bishop of Passau, all brothers. Did not spend a penny for man or horse in their towns, and had presents sent to his lodgings besides. Did not speak with them, for they were not in his way, but they have sent to ask him to write to the King, offering their services, and to say that Lodowick wished to visit the King, but would first send two gentlemen to know his pleasure. Said he would write to the King, and advise the Duke; for he thought if the Duke sent, and the King did not wish him to come, it would be a trouble to him to say Nay; and also the man who came would look for a great reward. If the King does not wish him to come, he had better write a letter of thanks for their goodwill and the kindness they have shown to Wallop. Duke Lodowic sends word that he will serve the King with 10,000 Almaines whenever he pleases, and that the French king wants him, but he will not comply.

Many of the noblemen wish that Henry was king of the Romans; and he has been sent to by great men, who say that, if he would, it might be brought to pass. Thinks it would be much more for his honor than his profit. They will not have the king of Bem, though he is a virtuous prince. It is said that the diet to be held at Regensburgh will not be held, and that the king of Hungary is assembling a great number of men, but it is not known what he intends, though some say he will attack Moravia, which is now subject to the king of Bohemia, but was formerly to the king of Hungary, as Silesia was also. 2962. The DATARY GIBERTO to CARDINAL TRIULZI.

Cesar (Ferdinand) and Langeais arrived yesterday. The French king is ardent for the continuation of the war. He will not consent to any agreement [with the Emperor], even though the Pope should do so. The French are confident that they have the king of England on their side, and say that if the Pope makes a separate agreement he will be the first to repent of it. When the French king heard that the Pope intended to come to terms on the arrival of Cesar, he was greatly grieved, but hoped the retreat of the Viceroy, the successes of our army here, and the capture of Zuechero, would confirm the Pope. Langeais has left 20,000 crowns in the hands of Salvinti (Legate in France). The French king has assigned 20,000 more for count Peter of Navarre. He has promised to give securities for the 50,000 cr. which he pays to the Pope on account of the tithes he has received. But our disease cannot await such tardy remedies as these, although they hold out hopes that if the matrimonial alliance be concluded, as they expect for certain, very great assistance will be obtained from that quarter. The Pope's disposition is consequently very bad. All day yesterday he was holding conferences, first with Cesar, then with Langeais, respecting this agreement. Whether it will be concluded or not will be known within two days. We have letters from England, but they only exhort the Pope not to lose courage. They were in hopes of concluding the marriage with the French king very shortly. Rome, 12 March 1527.

Has called his council and wardens together. Understands that sufficient redress has been made for Scotch subjects on the East and Middle Marches. As to those of Lydisdail and others, as the Armstrongs, Niksons, Elwalds, and Crosiers, has caused Angus the warden and others "to pass in hosting upon the said broken men," as will be explained by the bearer, the Duke's servant. 20 March. 2970. THOS. BUTLER, deceased.

R. O.

Complaint addressed to Sir Rob. Wingfield, deputy of Calais, and the Council there, by Thos. Kitchen and Anne his wife, daughter and executrix of Thos. Butler, soldier of the King's retinue at Calais, against Katharine Dekyn, widow, for having, immediately after Butler's death, taken out of his house certain documents, a ring, and some articles of furniture, dress, &c., which she still detains.

ii. Witness produced by Kitchen, 9 March 18 Hen.VIII., Agnes Gruffith, widow. Among the articles taken were, "2 great andirons of cast work, with faces and images," 1 image of alabaster, 1 pr. small andirons, 2 great fire-shovels, 2 pr. tongs, 2 little platters, 2 saweers, and 1 salt of tin, 2 quarts and 1 pint, a tester of a bed of say, and "a hanging about the house of green say, but the house is but little;" a second ring, which deponent thought worth 2 nobles, though she could not say whether it was gold, silver gilt, or copper gilt, and 2 tables, one of which had 2 tressles. Did not see her take "a doublet clocked with tynsen satin, with a plackard clocked with the same," though she has seen Thos. Butler wear such a doublet.

Further examined, 20 March, before the under marshal:—The andirons were not those produced to her in the council chamber.

iii. Answer of Katharine Decon.—The Friday before Butler died, two neighbours asked lady Bannmaster to come and exhort him to be shriven.

* The form of the privy seal and the date of its delivery differ from the enrolment; but the effect is the same.

She sent Katharine Decon to give him advice; and he desired her, after he was dead, to take certain pardon letters out of his chest, and put them in his winding sheet. She accordingly afterwards opened his chest, and took them out of his till; in which also were certain quittances, which she put in a small casket of bone, in presence of all those that were there. Keeps the casket in her possession. Saw no bags of writings or evidences, and took no ring. Saw nothing of several of the other articles. The tongs, saucers, platters, and image remain in the hands of Thos. Wells for a debt, as she told Thos. Kitchen's wife fourteen days ago, while sitting by the fire in my lady Bannaster's kitchen.

iv. Statement of dame Margaret Bapister, widow, addressed to the Deputy and Council, confirming the preceding.—She was called in because she had Butler's brother in marriage, "to inform him to be the servant of God." After his death she went to the commissary, Sir William Peterson, showing that the landlady and divers poor people demanded great debts; on which she was authorized by him to take the goods in her hands. This she did, and delivered again to Kitchen and his wife "of such as was there," delivering the parcels which have been brought before the Council to Thos. Wells for a debt which Butler owed him.

v. Witnesses produced by Katharine Decon, 20 March 18 Hen.VIII. :—

1. Ric. Staunford, porter. Was present in Butler's house two or three times while he lay sick, and at the visit of Katharine Decon after his death. Saw her take out of his purse a blank and a brass penny, and some writings in a linen bag out of a chest; also a signet of brass from the strings of the purse.

2. Thos. Baker. Was present, but did not see Katharine Decon do anything.

3. Thos. Wogan, servant to Mrs. Smyth. He and his mistress came to Butler's house after his death, and saw Katharine Decon take a groat out of his purse, and no more. Did not see her open any chest, or carry away writings. There was nothing in the house but a bed and bedstead, a painted cloth hanging at the head, a table, a chest, and a pair of andirons, now in the council chamber; also a quart-pot standing by the fire. His mistress came to see what goods there were to distrain for her rent, which was 53s. 4d. gr.; and as the stuff was not worth it, he went to lady Bannaster, who became debtor to him for the sum.

4. Adryan Story, widow. Was present, but did not see Katharine Decon do anything till next day, when she came to sew the body up in the winding sheet. She then took some writings out of a box, and cast them on a table. He saw in the house a table, 2 tressles, 2 old chests, 1 cupboard, 1 image of alabaster, 2 little feather beds, 2 andirons, now in the council chamber, 1 little "creper," 1 little skillet, 1 chair, and a piece of rotten old say hanging against the wall. The gold ring she never saw.

5. Jacomyn, wife of Ric. Cockes, spinner. Was present, but did not see Katharine Decon take anything out of the house. Was Butler's laundress, and knew everything that was in the house. Gives a list, differing from the preceding in not mentioning some articles of furniture, but adding, "a hanging round about the house, some of naughty painted cloths, and some of broken say," 1 pair of sheets, 5 shirts, 2 gowns (1 russet cotton and 1 russet cloth furred with cats), and a fustian doublet full of vermin, which was burnt in the street. The tester was half of painted cloths and half of "naughty say."

6. Marian, the wife of Maurice Cogan. Went to lady Bannaster for Katharine Decon before Butler's death, as he objected to be shriven. Did not see Katharine Decon take anything out of the house.

VII. B. ix. 75.

R. M.

Went to the Pope the . . . after the receipt of Wolsey's letter, and read it to his Holiness. He admitted the force of Wolsey's arguments, and said it would have been the surest way, if it had been practicable. Told him that if he had adhered to the League as he promised, a good peace would shortly have been made in England; and that owing to him there will be more wars in Italy than ever, and the Emperor will increase his demands. The Pope seems very sorry, and says he concluded the suspension, much against his will, for lack of money only. Even now he gets daily worse tidings from his camp; and the letters he received from cardinal Cibo, the legate at Bologna, put him in great fear. The Venetians remain inactive; the French are crying out for pay; and the Swiss say they will go their ways. It is the fault of the Venetians, who receive 40,000 ducats a month from France, and have only sent 9,000 at this crisis.

On the 14th there was a great mutiny among the Imperialists for pay, and Bourbon was fain to withdraw to a castle of the marquis de Guast; but on receiving money from the duke of Ferrara to pay them a crown a man, on the 17th they agreed to set forward. Have urged the Pope to provide money in case Florence be attacked. He says he can get none, and if the Imperialists advance he is undone. He cannot even pay his army on the confines of Naples, which is ready to dissolve. Signor Rana promised . . . weeks ago that if he had 50,000 crowns he would deliver him the whole realm of Naples shortly, but the Pope could do nothing; and though Langesis has now brought bills of exchange for 20,000 crowns, the Pope says it is only for three things; viz., for him, for signor Rana, and for the army on the confines of Naples. Langesis, when he departed, had promised the Pope 100,000 ducats, and this assignment of 50,000 is due only at Whitsuntide.

It is said the Viceroy lies this night at the Pope's town of Terrazyn, where Trevolche, the legate of the camp, will meet him, and accompany him hither. He is expected on Saturday next, the 23rd. The Pope had promised that if he did not arrive here by tomorrow, he would take no appointment with him; but he now says that as he has entered the territory of the Church, he must needs keep the appointment. Think it is not merely the want of money that has driven him to conclude this suspension, for he might have raised money by making cardinals; but he is afraid for Florence, distrusts the duke of Urbino, and believes the French and Venetians have not money to maintain the war. He says, though not expressed in the capitulations, the Imperialists have promised to give the French and Venetians long days to enter the League. Cautioned the Pope not to make any further appointment when the Viceroy came, and "lose all princes christened." He assured them he would make no further concessions. Rome, 20 March. Signed.

21 March. 2974. The FRENCH AMBASSADORS IN LONDON to FRANCIS I.

R. T. 137.

R. O.

Were expecting to hear from the Cardinal the conclusion he had come to with the King his master, when Wolsey sent for Douart and De Vaulx on Monday morning, the 19th. He received them with a "visaige assez megre," and began talking of a proposal made by the Venetian ambassador touching a year's truce, which the Pope thinks he could arrange with the viceroy of Naples. This, he said, would be very injurious to France:—the best plan was the conclusion of the marriage. He then sent for the Papal and Venetian ambassadors, and said the same thing in their presence, adding that his master had of old helped the Pope and the League for the sake of France, and was willing now to help him even with money, if France, the Pope, and Venice would bind themselves not to treat with the Emperor without his knowledge. Douart and De Vaulx promised to talk with the other ambassadors about this. Wolsey then returned to the subject of the marriage, saying the King his master insisted on the said two demands being complied with before entering into any negotiations, and that he knew the objections raised by Francis arose merely out of his desire to marry Madame Eleanor; and if so, we should say it boldly, and he would get his master to agree to it, when they could dispose of the Princess to the duke of Orleans.

On the 19th, the Cardinal sent for them in presence of the same commissioners as before, except Suffolk. He asked De Tarbe and De Turenne if they were well enough lodged, otherwise he would make better arrangements for them. They said, only too well, if their master's affairs went rightly, and begged that he would think about giving them a speedy dispatch, not lodging them. They said they were surprised at what he had said to Douart and De Vaulx the preceding day, and did not know what condition he was going to affix to the marriage, and, but for their uncertainty on this point, they would have settled the League and the transport of the Princess. He said his demands must be satisfied before anything was done. They replied that this seemed strange, as they knew no good means to communicate it to Francis, and were not sure, considering the ages of the King and Queen, that the Princess would be left their heir; whereas Wolsey had always promised "que pour l'advenir vous le payeriez a vos heritiers." Wolsey said "que nous missions aux descendans de vous et d'elle;" which they thought would be more reasonable. But on this he said he had spoken without commission, but they might make overtures on the subject, which he would gladly hear. He then talked for a time with his councillors. The ambassadors then withdrew to the Cardinal's chamber, where he began an oration to them, saying that the King and he had read the letters written to them by Francis, and shown them to the Council, whereby they perceived the great difficulty Francis had made in conceding their demands, while those put forward by the French were not less; on which account the King had commanded them to say that without that (sans cela) the marriage could not take effect. He assured them, however, that the King was anxious to satisfy Francis, if it could be done.

On this the ambassadors began to speak less coldly, saying that they had been prevented by their instructions hitherto from conceding the demands made on them; but that they would enter into the conditions of the marriage, and, if satisfied about them and the offensive league, Francis would grant something reasonable, qualified, however, for his heirs and successors. Wolsey afterwards said this article was nothing, and again insisted on the two demands as necessary before anything else. On the subject of the

"traduction" of the Princess, they had a good deal of discussion, Wolsey insisting that it should not be till she was of marriageable age, which time Madame and the queen of England were to judge of. As to the offensive league, after being much pressed for his opinion, he replied that it ought to be treated of along with the peace and marriage, after which England and France could send ambassadors to the Emperor to require him to enter, "à la delivrance de nosces (noces)," with honorable conditions, which if he refuse, they can both declare war. It is true he could not make war till the end of June. The ambassadors, nevertheless, ventured to offer the 15,000 crowns, during the life of this King:—an offer which Wolsey treated as if they had presented him with a pair of gloves, obstinately insisting that if they would contract marriage, they must commence "par là," and that Francis's refusal to do so could only be from his desire to marry Madame Eleanor. The ambassadors said if Francis had any such desire, he did [not?] require mediators, for he might have her whenever he pleased. Perceiving that he was not willing to do anything to Francis's mind, the ambassadors took leave of Wolsey about two o'clock, till which hour he had made them fast. After dinner, De Tarbe, Douarty and De Vaulx returned to Wolsey to know if, in case Francis on being written to should agree to their demands, the English would make the traduction promptly, keeping surely the offensive league on their side, or at least pretending to do so,—in order to make the English think that they themselves were sincere. Wolsey, though he received them at first with a cordial countenance, supposing that they brought him better news, at once declared that if Francis gave half his realm they would not give up the Princess at once, but that he should wait till she was 14. At last he told them that it should be referred to the two Queen mothers before mentioned.

As to the propositions formerly made by Feu Guilhen (Fitzwilliam), he would have nothing to say to them, declaring that Francis should neither give nor receive hostages, but must trust the promise of the King and of his Lords. He reminded them of what had been done to Madame Margaret, and said that in this case Francis could marry her in France or elsewhere, as he pleased. The ambassadors objected that the French had no surety, in case of Henry's death, of having the Princess when she came of age, and asked what in that case would become of the 50,000 crowns and the salt. The English replied, that in that case the promise would be null, and again said that if Francis had any desire for Eleanor, he should say so, and that some arrangement might be made, either by means of the duke of Orleans, or the duke of Richmond. Considering the terms held by the English, the ambassadors have declined to go further till they hear from Francis. Thence the Admiral conducted Clerk to my Lady, who bade him write to Wolsey, “her own best beloved whetson,” to remember that he has always been the author of amity between the two Princesses, and that she, at his instance, has made endeavors for the same; and she took a great oath, that if it had not been for her, her son, by the advice of his whole cou[n]cil, would before this have married lady Elionora. “And said unto me, What a thing should th all our communication with you and Mr. Fitzwill[am] it ment that my lady Princess the be delivered by and had with me or lady Princess’s deliverance not greatly, there was any, albeit might be that there was, but that supposed my said Princess to be now 12 years, in which case she mought [be] delivered 6 or 7 months hereafter w[ithout danger].” She trusted Wolsey would not s[tick in this] matter. Deposits that he entered upon this business in France about twenty-two or twenty-three years since, and six years ago he sold to Babou, treasurer of Madame the Regent, a diamond for 1,000 crowns. About the same time, he visited England, and sold to the King there fifty "p[ie]rres? rondes pucelles" for 30 crowns a-piece, and some time afterwards being at London to obtain 1,000 crowns, balance of 3,000 cr., from the duke of Su[ffolk] for jewelry, it was then proposed to him by Master Berches, valet-de-chambre to Henry VIII., to go to Milan to recover a balass ruby in the possession of Lautree, and receive from him for this purpose 600*l.* stg., giving in security for this sum certain precious stones with a spurious emerald. Did not succeed in his journey, because Lautree refused to sell the ruby, and returned to England to obtain his debt from the duke of Suffolk, who gave him authority to recover the said sum from Jeann Boudet, receiver for the Duchess, which has not been paid. He has never recovered the stones he left with Berches as security, and wrote to him to say that the emerald was not genuine, and he would gladly recover it by paying a portion of the money owing to the Extracts from the letters of the Prothonotary Casale, 24 March 1526.

The Venetians, who had determined to press the Pope not to agree with the Imperialists, will not enter the treaty now that it is concluded, nor do anything against the wish of the kings of France and England, especially now that they are so united. If the present dangers are to be met, war must be actively commenced before the crops are gathered in. George Salspruk, leader of the Germans, attacked "subita quadam guttæ instillatione," lies at Ferrara at the point of death. The Venetians complain that the Pope did not enter the treaty from necessity, but because he did not wish them and the French to be too powerful in Italy, lest they should gain possession of Naples. The Pope complains of them for not sending on their troops; but they say they did not choose to send them to evident destruction, seeing how inclined his Holiness was for peace; that they did not wish them to have gone so far; and that the Pope only urged their further progress that he might the easier bring the Imperialists to what he wanted. This, they say, they did not deserve from him.

Wyatt is liberated, chiefly by the aid of the duke of Ferrara. The promised departure of the Germans is now expected. It is thought impossible for Bourbon to make them return without money. Hears that Caesar Fernusca has brought to the camp 30,000 cr., which are thought to have been paid by the Pope, who, it is said, will add another 30,000 cr., though he promised the Imperialists to help them to collect money at Rome.

Neither the Germans nor the Spaniards have yet departed, but Ferrara is being treated with to allow them a safe passage, and to make a bridge over the Po, so that they can cross into Venetian territory. The Duke will grant them a safe-conduct, but will not build a bridge.

Dispatched a servant on the 8th, and sent duplicates of the letters by sea. Could not get another messenger by land, as Spaniards are not allowed to pass the borders of France, or Frenchmen those of Spain; nor will they let the French ambassador's letters go with ours. Some time ago they stopped English merchants, whom the captains of Fountarabia handled somewhat roughly, but Lee obtained a general order from the Emperor in favor of English subjects so long as they do not bring in Frenchmen or Frenchmen's letters. The "contrerelator" who passed through England out of Flanders arrived on the 22 March, bringing letters from don Inigo to the Emperor, but none to us. Don Inigo writes to him what things the French ambassadors, who arrived on the 2 March, proposed to the King, and the King's answer. He informs the Emperor of the entry into the treaty of peace, of the offers of the French, and of what he had disclosed to the King on the Emperor's behalf. They are much pleased at the King's determination to maintain the old alliance. The Chancellor says that the French put off going to England, and would not have gone at all if they had had the answer they looked for from the Emperor. Perhaps he spoke by conjecture, but they evidently know many secrets of the French court. The French ambassador here spread some time ago a rumor of the Queen's death, though by report of the contrerelator she was in good health on the 9th.

The Chancellor said the Pope and Viceroy were agreed, and peace would have been made, but that the Venetian ambassador asked six days' respite to send for power to conclude, and an eight days' truce was taken. Meanwhile, the Viceroy's company "had overthrow and lost some of the ordnance," so that it is not clear how matters stand now.

Hears that now the Pope sends hither the general minister of the Observants, with whom comes Caesar le Graunde. Hopes their coming will not be much needed, as peace has begun to be treated in England.

The Chancellor goes to Barcelona on the 30th,—some say to go to his own country, Savoy,—others towards Italy, which is not likely, things standing as they do; although he is informed that the Emperor is making sixteen or twenty new galleys at Malaga, perhaps against the Moors in Africa. The Chancellor himself told us he had "made vow to Montserrat, which is a great pilgrimage," and would remain nine days at Barcelona, where the Emperor could send for him, if needful. "We well perceived that he cannot well digest something in his stomach, for much alteration is in his countenance. Where he was wont to be all merry and of pleasant countenance, he is now all sad." His absence will be regretted by all ambassadors. "He is very gentle and open." Has always found him ready to do the King service.

The Parliament here, except one or two orders of religion, have granted nothing yet. The bishops say that they can grant nothing without the Pope's leave; the comandadors of Alcantara, Calatrava, and St. James, "that they have no foundation but to defend this country against the Moors' borderers." Men think little will be got from this parliament, but that the bishops will have no further excuse if the Emperor make peace with the Pope.

"Here is a quaiet, and but one of six leaves emprinted, intituled, Harmonii Tarentini Oratio pro republica Christiana ad principes," most calumnious against the Emperor and Henry. He is a Milanese, or adherent of Francis Sforza. Quotes some extracts to show this.

They have printed here "Apologies to the Pope's breves and to the French king's letter sent to the electors of the Empire;" also the articles of the league of Italy, which he sends, because mention is made therein of the King. These men may see how much the King was pressed to enter the league, but would not. The statement made by the indicter of the league in name of the confederates, that the King urged them to enter it, confutes itself; for if so, why did they afterwards write that they had urged him? Has no doubt they would accuse him of unkindness for his refusal if they dared avow it. All the world is yours; but only for their own profit, and on condition they shall always have more need of you than you of them. Has written other things that touch the King to Wolsey.

The Turk is said to have taken another town in Hungary, and to have about 100,000 men. It is feared the Baheda, who usurps the crown, will rather join the Turk than lose his hold. Valladolid, 25 March 1527.

At the time of the Emperor's departure from Granada, a merchant of Seville came to him, in behalf of the merchants there, soliciting his intercession that English cloths might be as free here as those of Spain. Advised them first to present their petition to the President, and tell him what answer they had. Thinks they did nothing more at that time; but since his servant was despatched to England, the same merchant has been with him to get the Emperor to command the President to declare void all laws against English cloths. Spoke to the Emperor about it, telling him the petition was from his own subjects; and he promised that his Council should consider it. Expected an answer from the Chancellor. Asked Almain to whom we should resort in his absence. He said he would himself be always ready, although from the Chancellor "we might perceive that the confessor, a Friar Dominic, should occupy that room for so much." As to the cloth, Almain said he had seen the grants of Ferdinand and Isabella that English cloth should be free, and that don Inigo had a commission to conclude therein. So Wolsey can have the grant renewed as part of the league. English merchants here complain that the false making of the cloths is putting the realm to slander.

Took occasion to remind the Emperor that Wolsey gave up the bulls of the bishopric of Badajoz on his Majesty assigning to him 2,500 ducats on the bishopric of Toledo, which Wolsey's proctors had repeatedly demanded of the Archbishop, but could not obtain. He said he thought the Archbishop only waited to see the bulls. Lee said he thought no bulls would be necessary if the Emperor would give him his letters avowing that he had assigned 2,500 ducats to Wolsey out of the pension imposed by the Pope; but in any case such letters would be needed. The Emperor promised that he would give them. To conceive these letters the better, have tried all means to get a copy of the Archbishop's bulls, either of him or of the executors of another who has a like pension of Toledo, but have not succeeded. Will draw up the letters without them, and see what answer the Archbishop will make.

Has obtained for Wolsey two payments of the bishop of Palance, viz. 1,320 ducats, at 4s. 6d. the ducat; "whereof 1,200 the prior of St. Mary Overy's of my diet money and other shall make to your Grace," as he has already written to Wolsey, Wyatt and the Prior. The remaining 120 I delivered to my servant, sent in post as I wrote to Brian Tuke, to whom I now write of 13 ducats more for conveyance of our duplicate letters sent by my servant. Found means at this time to send by sea for so little, which ordinarily costs 200 or 300 ducats. The bishop of Palance has not yet paid for Christmas, and desires respite till May, having paid, like other bishops, much money to the Emperor at Granada, to be sent to don Ferdinand.

Has offered John Almain 1,000 ducats yearly for his diligence in procuring Wolsey's pensions of 9,000 cr. and arrears on Toledo and Palencia. He seemed willing to take it under the name of reward, but not as pension. Trusts Wolsey will confirm it by his letters to quicken him. Hopes by this time he has heard something of the little cipher.

Finds by one of Wolsey's letters that he computes the pension of Toledo at 7,500 ducats. Wishes it were, but Mr. Dean only left remembrance with him for 2,500 ducats yearly, which amounted to 7,500 ducats for three years then in arrear. Now another year is due. Thinks Wolsey should assign Almain 500 ducats out of the 9,000 cr. to make him more diligent, and the other 500 out of Toledo. The Archbishop has been sick three or four weeks, and still keeps close. Wrote already "that the Emperor hath sent the bishoprick of Burgos to don Inachus,* but with pension of 9,000 ducats, so that in manner, accounting what he shall leave, sc. other 9,000 ducats, he shall nothing have." Some say it was offered to the Chancellor also "with pension," but he refused it, thinking he deserved the whole. "He departeth very sad, thinking some unkindness, whatsoever it is." It is said his pension from the Emperor is so far in arrear that he cannot live here. "His seals be distribute, two of them under lock, wherof the toone kaye hath a secretary brought up with the Chancellor, for he shall remain Chancellor during his life with the pension." The seal of Burgundy the Emperor retains. It is thought De Pratt will have it. Thanks Wolsey for speaking favorably of him to the King. Had to borrow above 200*l.* when he left England, besides what money he had of his own, and the 100 marks Wolsey got for him of the King. Valladolid, 25 March 1527.

Arrival of the "contrerelator." (See Lee's letter to the King.)

Don Inigo reported that the French ambassadors had proposed three things: 1, thanks to the King for procuring Francis's delivery; 2, desiring him also to procure the delivery of his sons; and, 3, that as Francis had made several ineffectual requests to the Emperor for delivery of his spouse the queen of Portugal, he was constrained to seek a wife elsewhere, and desired the King to give him the princess Mary. The King had answered, —1, that he had only done for Francis what one prince was bound in honor to do for another; 2, that he would do his best to procure the delivery of the French king's sons, but he thought the only way was by treating of peace between him and the Emperor; and, 3, he thanked Francis for offering his own person for the Princess, and there would be time enough to confer about it. The Chancellor says they have already begun to treat of peace in England, and the French deny they made any such offer to the Viceroy as the Imperialists allege. He blames Almain for not sending "the bill of the said offer" to don Inigo, and says don Inigo was there six weeks before he received the secret instructions, which they promised Lee that they would send by Echyngham, and then said they had sent by a gentleman of Beauron's. They also said that this gentleman had arrived on the 19th Jan., the day of the despatch of the first post from don Inigo, which was only fourteen days after his arrival. "Wherefore, if don Inachus write the truth, these fail thereof."

Lee afterwards called on John Almain, who confirmed what the Chancellor had stated, and said the King had told the French ambassadors that as the Princess was of tender age there was plenty of time to talk about marrying her. He said that in the negotiations for peace don Inigo had already renounced the Emperor's demand for Burgundy, and had declared to the King the Emperor's willingness that in Italy every one should keep what he has. Thus the towns now in Bourbon's hands will remain in his hands till it be decided whether Sforza be in default; "and it seemed to me that he said that the Emperor is content that the King's highness should choose the judges." Otherwise, the Emperor will do his best to satisfy the Pope.

The French king offers, if he have a son by the Princess, who must be heir of England, to deliver to his behoof Normandy, Gascony, Guienne, Anjou, &c. Almain added, "I pray God they keep better promise with you than they do with us. There is no trust in them; and once afore you had the said countries delivered by the treaty of Calais, and yet they put you out again." Answered that doubtless the greatest sureties would be taken of them, and that the Frenchmen would never have been able to put the English out "if Spain had not holpen them, provoked against us for the reduction of don Peter, called the Cruel." He said there was a rumor in England that the King would make Ireland a kingdom, and the duke of Somerset king, which made many fear "lest at length we should have such an enemy of Ireland as we have of Scotland." Leo said the King and his Council could provide against that danger; and he replied, "I pray God it may be so, for I am a good Englishman, and knowledge my first setting forth to come by England."

Were told by the Chancellor that the Pope and Viceroy had once agreed upon articles, but the Venetian ambassador asked a delay of six days, as he had no mandatum, and meanwhile the Viceroy met with a defeat. The Chancellor also said that the French ambassadors were putting off coming to England, and would not come if they had good answer of the Emperor.

The Chancellor is now leaving this, the common voice says, not to return. He hinted to us that he would not, unless the Emperor called him. He pretends to go on pilgrimage to Montserrate, which is on the way to Barcelona. "It is too long a pilgrimage of 300 evil miles for a man of his age, except he went somewhat further." "He hath something in his stomach, which we might well perceive by the great alteration from his accustomed hilarity." Some think the Emperor will send for him again; others, that the Emperor "will into Arragon," where he will return and join him; others, that he is "precursor in Italiam." Are told Wolsey has sent assurances by don Inigo that, notwithstanding any practices with the Frenchmen, the King would maintain his amity with the house of Burgundy; also, that on being asked if he would write anything by the contrerelator, he said he would despatch a courier by land within three days. This courier is anxiously expected. They say his despatch will go far to confirm the old amity. Almain says the French king has sent no larger commission into England than he did by Bayard.

There have been rumors, not yet all dead, that the king of Navarre was preparing to recover his country; "insomuch that the ordinary of this country was commanded to repair thither." Spies say they are waiting the turn of affairs in Italy. The Parliament here. The pamphlet of Harmonius Tarentinus:—the name is feigned.

What offended us in the answer made to the confederates, of which we wrote, was the pretence that the King had offered his mediation without being desired. Have since thought it best, if the treaty went forward, not to expostulate, and now we let the matter die on account of the Chancellor's departure. Valladolid, 25 March 1527. Signed.

25 March. 2989. LAURENCE STARKEY to [SIR JOHN HUNSEY?]

R. O.

Since your departure from London, I have heard from my friends in Lancashire of Rich. Banke's untrue dealings. He had charged the servants and tenants, in lord Montegle's name, to have nothing to do with your chaplain, and not to occupy the demesnes let by him. Coupland has ordered the chaplain in the Cardinal's name not to meddle with anything. Bank and Strete have writings from lord Montegle and Cromwell, and writs of subpoena to Darcy and you. Strete will deliver them at Sleforth, on his way to Lancashire. They intend thus to disappoint all the chaplain has done at Hornby, Mellyng, or elsewhere. Wished to tell you this before you departed. Banke has spent most of my Lord's goods, and now flatters him, and lays the blame on you. Has procured, without Banke's knowing it, a copy of his complaints to the Cardinal. Has sent Darcy a copy, and will give you one, if Darcy does not send one. The matter should be looked to, or you will have great loss and rebuke, for Banke has no lands or money.

Advises him to write to Humfrey Wingfield, who is in great favor with the Cardinal, to get an order either from him or the Chancellor of the duchy to prevent Banke from meddling with the benefice, and another from the Council about the lands, as he is bound for them also. This must be done shortly, as the year for the benefice begins on St. Mark's Day, in Easter week. If he will put Starkey in authority, will find sureties for the whole charge, and will not desist for Banke and all his letters. Has writs de non molestando to all the King's officers. When he wrote the other letters which the bearer has, did not know he would go to Slyforth, but gave him 2*d.* to deliver them at the George at Grauntham. Now, finding that he is going to Slyforth, sends a copy of the complaint presented by Banke against Darcy and you. Banke sent it to him in the night, and left it with him till the morning. Encloses a letter from Chr. Hochkynson. Wishes it returned by the next man whom you send to "my Lady your bed-fellow." Knows that Banke has "turmoyledd" all my Lady's evidence, and laid apart some of the pieces. "He reported in his drunkenness that they should make him peace." If Mr. Warde had executed your writing sent to Mr. Standlay two years ago, to look after my Lord's evidence, and to put away Banke and the knaves he keeps in the castle, you would have been without this business, and 200*l.* of my Lord's goods would have been saved, which he has wasted. The steward was well willed to do it, and Warde can tell him how it was stopped. Would put him out if he had authority, for he (Starkey) is feoffee in my Lord's lands, which Banke is not. The only feoffees now alive are himself, Sir Wm. Molyneux, knt., and Sir Randall Pole, clk. If you will take no further direction about the execution of my Lord's will, I will do what I can myself, for the longer Banke stays the worse it will be. One Copeland has sold, since Starkey left, 22 steers, some worth 20*s.* each, much of the corn on the demaynes, and part of that on the benefice of Mellyng. By this time he has finished it, and then the apparel and household stuff will follow. He has with him his complaint against you, and writings from my Lord and Mr. Cromwell to "fear" the country, and prevent you from meddling. He told Starkey that he had been with Peryn, the King's auditor, and told him that he should owe the King at Michaelmas 900*l.*, beside the Martinmas rents. This is done only to show the country that they should not favor you. Reminds him that my Lord is now almost at his lawful age, and he should order this small time so that neither he nor Darcy are slandered. Your chaplain reported at Hornby that Banke sent a writing to lord Darcy and you to keep me from meddling with my Lord's will. Should like to have this to put with other things that he has against him. All the country, except a priest and four or five knaves whom he keeps with my Lord's goods, are weary of him.

Besides what is at this time written to Wolsey about the king of Scots' purpose to repress the thieves of Litheresdale, sends two letters from James, to the duke of Richmond and himself, of thanks for the hounds lately sent him. Has heard by various letters that the Queen, on repairing to her son, desired leave for Harry Steward to come to court, and was displeased that the King would not grant it. The abp. of St. Andrew's is also kept from court, and repairs to the Queen at Stirling. Angus has the whole rule, and Patrick Sinclair, who is taken into favor, may speak freely. He has appointed to meet Magnus in Northumberland. Will inform Wolsey of everything when he comes up at Easter, for business will detain him in Northumberland till after Palm Sunday. Good rule is kept on the Borders. Hopes punishment will soon be given to Liddesdale, "which matter wanteth no calling upon." York, in the Assize time, 26 March.

Letters have since arrived from Genoa, stating that Bourbon on the 14 March "departed from the castle of Jhon, between Mutina and Bononie, with footmen, 10,000 Almans, 6,000 Spaniards, 4,000 Italians, and 700 gravis armatura, and 1,700 levis armatura." On the 19th, if he went straight, he would have reached Florence; if by Romandiola, Ancona. 3001. RUSSELL and SIR G. CASALE to [WOLSEY].

Since they last wrote, have been informed "that the Vice[roy will] not come hither unless the legate cardinal Trev[ulcio go] to Galetta for to cause Andrea Doreo with his com[pany to] retire; which done, he to return to Rome;" also that Caesar Fepomuske had money with him in Lombardy. Went to the Pope, and reproached him with violating his promises. He said he could not but assure the Viceroy that Andrea Doreo should not in his absence follow the enterprise of Naples. The money, he said, was not given by him; it was paid by the Florentines on bills of exchange given by Philip Strozi, who is a prisoner in Naples, and Jacobo Salviati. Told the Pope the Florentines would not have paid it against his will; and he said the lance-knights would not have retired without it. Said they feared such payments would increase. The lanceknights in Lombardy were compelled to remain still by the extreme severity of the weather; and their captain, Georgio, is paralysed on one side, so that it was "much requisite for them to retire" at any rate. Signor Rans' gentleman has returned from France with authority and instructions to signor Alberto, which Langle (Langenis) should have brought; "which, he sayeth, concludeth nothing, because he seeth no manner of provision of money, and is mentioned no more of the 20,000 ducats a month; so that in the cause the Frenchmen were never seen so cold." Still they say that, notwithstanding the Pope's agreement, "they wd gallantly follow the wars; but no provision is made here therefor." Answer has also come from the Venetians that they will continue the war in Lombardy, but will contribute nothing for Naples, and require that the 20,000 ducats brought by Langle be employed in the wars of Lombardy.

Have spoken with the Viceroy, who says he came to make a good peace; but this will do little, unless the other confederates enter it, for which he allows them a month's respite. He said the Emperor desired no more than peace, and "gladly would have the same swearing a great oath that he knew so much of his [master's] mind that he would never deliver the French king[']s sons] perforce, though all princes Christian were against him, [but] rather lose Naples, Spain, and Flanders, with all other [his] countries, reserving two or three towns and castles, w[here] he, with them, would live the rest of his life. He said the Emperor had sent commissioners to England to treat of peace. This the writers urged him to promote, as it would be more to his master's honor if made there, which it would certainly be if not hindered by the Emperor's ministers here. Never saw the Viceroy so lowly and gentle, "which is a marvel to all men that knew him before." Think it is owing to the marriage between the French King and my lady Princess, which he would not at first believe would take effect. He sees that if the King and Francis agree, the Low Countries are lost to the Emperor, "which countries he esteemeth more than all the realms he hath." This will dispose him to peace. The Viceroy told the Pope he knew the uttermost of the Emperor's mind, "as well that thing impossible, as also that difficile and felle." Being asked, he answered that the Emperor was willing to deliver the French king's children upon ransom, without demanding Burgogne, but he would not have Milan for himself or his brother,—that he was willing to refer the duke Francisco's matter to impartial judges. Hears that the King has ordered to be sent to Italy 100,000 cr. to maintain his Holiness.

Alberto, the French ambassador, speaks much of the ability of [your Grace], saying that Christendom would be blest if his master had such a minister. Thinks all should be put into Wolsey's hands, otherwise Francis will lose his credit in Italy. The Da[tary] is to be sent to France, and then to England. He is very civil to Russell. Wolsey has won great fame at Rome, "so that if your Grace might have been here with wishing, you should have been Pope long since." Not only do the gentlemen, prelates, and others say this, but the cardinals also. Sauga goes with the Datary. Desires to be recalled. Brought nothing here but what he carried with him in post Extracts from the joint letter of Russell and Sir Gregory, in cipher, dated 26 March.

Suppose that Giacomo Salviati and the archbishop of Capua exhorted the Pope to do this, as the kings of England and France, being united, were ready to carry on a perpetual war against the Emperor, with the Venetians so that his Holiness will be friendly to both sides, and will be considered judge, as the king of England was formerly. This is confirmed by the fact that the Archbishop pointed this out to the Pope, as they have already written, and wrote accusing them of disturbing the truce, that it might be made in England, and they have found out from the Pope that he thinks himself safe for this reason. He said also that he was contented with what was contained in the capitulation of the Imperialists, for they confessed they could make no defence in Naples. In Lombardy there had been so much snow and rain that the Germans could not get to Florence; so that it seems the Pope made the truce willingly rather than from necessity.

Have heard from a secret source that the Pope has been persuaded to go to Spain by the same person who drew him into the truce. The Imperialists encourage him to do so, saying that, if he does this honor to the Emperor, the latter will immediately restore the French king's sons and the duchy of Milan, for he could not wish for a greater honor than a visit from the Pope. They have, therefore, determined to send the general of the Franchiscans to Spain, and the Datary to France, to persuade the French king to be content with this journey of the Pope's, as it may bring about the delivery of his sons. Has spoken on the matter to D. Albertus (Carpis), whom the Imperialists have promised the restoration of his state. I agree with them that the French look only superficially at what pleases them, and will consent to this journey, as the Princes may be restored by. Expect nothing but harm from this journey, for when a merchant goes to buy goods, he makes them dearer, and they never saw the Emperor become humbler in consequence of obtaining glory. As they have heard that the Pope said he would not go without the consent of the kings of England and France, and the Legate, and Francis will probably look merely to his own advantage, the Legate had better write instantly, and meanwhile they will bring forward many true reasons against it, viz., that if the Pope, who is victorious, dares not look to his own advantage here, how can he do so in Spain?—that he is not the man to bring the Emperor to his wishes; that the Emperor will persuade him, and make himself master of Italy and the Papal authority. The Colonians will lose their power as soon as he starts for Spain; nor is it likely the Emperor will restore the French princes.

this way, unless moved by Divine inspiration. Unless the Pope acts on other plans, it is certain that the Emperor will have all he wants.

ii. From letters of March 29.

Have been to the Pope, and told him they had heard he wished to go to Spain. He answered, that if the allies entered the truce he would gladly go thither with the consent of the kings of England and France, if he first saw that the Emperor was inclined to peace, and that he was sending the Datary to France and England about it. Told him to reflect what a disgrace it would be to the See, as, for 80 years, no Pope had ever gone to the Emperor, but the Emperor had come to the Pope,—and held up the Legate, whom the Emperor had often gone to meet, as an example. Assured him the King would never consent, from his zeal for the Holy See. Answered about the peace as above, and told him that as all the confederates had put everything in the hands of the King and the Legate, he should take care not to insult them by taking away from them the good work of treating with the Viceroy, especially as the Viceroy says he can treat better in England. As to sending the Datary, answered that if he intends to send him, he should give him power of making peace or war, and place the conduct of the peace in the King's hand. As to the war, the Pope has said that he is ready to make a new treaty, if the king of England will join it, and that the contribution shall be proportioned to all, so that he shall not be compelled to bear all the expence; they think, therefore, that his Holiness should give the Datary power to arrange such a treaty, if the King cannot bring the Emperor to an honorable peace, and to make sure that the war shall not be carried on so unseasonably as it was before. He said he would do this, and they advised him to show himself unyielding to the Viceroy. The Datary says, in excuse of the Pope, that, from fear, he dares not tell them all he has treated with the Imperialists, especially about the money which the Spaniards have had; and for the same reason, he said he would make a new treaty and contribute, but that really he cannot collect enough money for ten years.

Has received his writings by his servant, the bearer, who brought also letters to the King from the king of England. At his arrival James was in the North, and the answer had to be delayed till his return. Sends it now. Will meet Northumberland on the Borders for redress when he pleases. Desires to have the "counterpayn." Northumberland desires him to come to Berwick or Northame, but he trusts he will not require him to meet except according to custom. The Pope has heard that the lanceknights are unwilling to retire, whereupon certain changes have been made, as appears by the letters of Guicciardino of the 29 March. The Spaniards asked payment for sixteen months, the lanceknights all that was promised them, viz. "monna[yes], and towns to sack." They were ready to have slain Ferramosca, who fled to the duke of Ferrara, "and Bourbon . . . much to suffer and in great danger; for which [cause we] have moved the Pope's Holiness to take heed and [try] to defend him, for that we see no other rem[edy]." The Viceroy, in communing with the Pope, said he was sorry that Bourbon had not done his devoir, but he would remedy all, and will find in Rome 40,000 ducats, which, with the 60,000 from Salviati, he thinks will content them. If not, he swears he will take the Pope's part:—"which sayings hath sufficed the Pope's Holiness, thinking, if case require, that he will surely go." Guicciardino writes that the duke of Urbino and the Venetians have repassed the Po, contrary to promise. They are probably afraid the lanceknights should advance towards Venice. Sends a copy of the capitulations passed by the Pope, also of the Viceroy's power from the Emperor. Wyatt went to Venice after Russell's hurt, then to Ferrara, being desirous of seeing the country, "pretending soon to come by Bologna and Florence hither." Notwithstanding the Duke's safe-conduct he was taken by the Spaniards. They demanded 3,000 ducats for his ransom, notwithstanding Russell's protestations. He has since managed to escape. Don Fernando, king of Bohemia, has sent ambassadors hither to inform the King of the invasion of Hungary by the Turk, and his preparations. As the resistance to the Turk depends on a universal peace, the King and Cardinal have thought best that one of them, Dr. Fabry, who, they say, is much inclined to the said peace, should go to the Emperor to solicit aid, passing by the French court on his way, whence, according to the pleasure of Francis, he may continue his journey or return. They have, however, demanded surety for his passage, which the King and Wolsey have given, from their confidence in Francis. Desire him, therefore, to see the Doctor safely conducted, or let him pass, as he thinks best. London, 2 April. Signed.

They have acted as much against your interests as the ambassadors of the king of France. The Viceroy sent me to Rome, and I was there with the said ambassador. I was there some days, during which the general [of the Franciscans] and I made a proposition less strong than the first. . . . but as the English ambassador requested the Pope to defer the conclusion for a week, during which he would go to Venice, the Pope could not refuse his demand. Information for obtaining a Papal brief against James Melvin, an Observant Friar, who has turned apostate and left Scotland, making a direct appeal to the Pope, without submission to his superiors.

About the beginning of August last year he began to disturb the peace of many in the province of Scotland, and summoned the bishop of Moray to the court of the archbishop of St. Andrew's. Being admonished to desist under threat of punishment, he left Scotland alone, fixing his pretended appeal on the doors of the churches of St. Andrew's, where he took shipping. The appeal should be declared frivolous, being against a superior, who only enjoined him to desist from his suit till the next provincial chapter, to avoid scandal. He himself to be excommunicated, and all who aid his apostacy. Any bulls that he may obtain allowing him to remain disobedient, or to become a bishop's suffragan, to be declared surreptitious and null by virtue of a bull of Alexander VI., and the case to be committed by the Pope to the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane, and the abbot of Cantabrueth, along with the provincial of Scotland.

3023. JOHN CASALE, Prothonotary, to WOISEY.

Can write nothing with certainty, as everything now depends on this convention of the Pope and Viceroy, and Bourbon is uncertain whether to sign the articles. He will hear these matters from Russell and his brother Gregory, a copy of whose letters he has sent, as usual, to Clerk. Since he last wrote in duplicate of this concord of the Pope, the following has occurred.

Bourbon, immediately on hearing of it, assembled his captains, and ordered them to consult the soldiers as to what was best to be done, showing them the difficulties of stopping or returning, and also the dangers of the march into Tuscany, and exhorting them still to serve the Emperor, when all these difficulties would be easily overcome. Most of the army, especially the Spaniards, wished to proceed; some saying that they were ready to bear anything, even to eat roots. Encloses a copy of a letter from one who was present. The troops who were collecting necessities at Ferrara have been sent for, as he will see by the enclosed letter of a servant of his, whom he had sent thither to obtain the liberation of Wyatt, which he has at last effected. On March 28 the Imperialists determined not to follow the Viceroy's wishes, but to march the next day into Tuscany or Anania, or any other place more profitable to themselves. The marquis de Guasto refused to comply with this decision, not wishing to oppose the Emperor's will; and many noblemen have gone with him to Ferrara. Guicciardini, the Pope's lieutenant at Bologna, hearing of this, was alarmed; and, as he thought it was done by the Viceroy's wish, wrote to the senate of Venice, asking them to advance their army to meet the Imperialists. The Senate were divided; some doubting whether they should put their army into danger for the sake of the Pope, who has deserted them, and whose intention about carrying on the war they do not know. Finally, they determined to do everything, if the Pope seemed ready to renew the war. Exhorted them to write thus to his Holiness, to encourage him to refuse the Imperial offers. This they have done.

Other letters have come from Guicciardini of the 29th, saying that the enemy have moved from S. Giovanni towards Bologna, and repeating his request to the Signory. The enemy had arrived at the bridge over the Reno, two miles from Bologna, and made prisoners a few light horse who called out of the city. The chief part then passed Bologna on the way to Anania; and the French troops in Bologna, leaving the city fortified, marched towards Imola to intercept them. The citizens of Bologna had no fear of an assault.

On receiving this news, went again to the Signory, who professed their readiness to help the Pope, not only if he resumed the war, but even if he persisted in the truce. Two days ago, and yesterday, letters came from Rome that the Pope had heard that Bourbon not only had refused to confirm the truce, but had moved his army; at which the Pope was much alarmed, and complained that the Viceroy had promised that Bourbon should desist from his endeavors. The Pope is not yet making preparations; and in case Bourbon does not enter the truce, either because he cannot do so, or because he has so agreed with the Viceroy, as Sir Gregory writes from Rome, his Holiness begs them to send their army. They have accordingly ordered the duke of Urbino to cross the Po, which Casale does not think he will make haste to do, as the Pope does not seem inclined to war, according to letters received today from Rome, copies of which are enclosed. Fears the Pope will make a truce with the Viceroy, and be deceived by him to his ruin. Many think the Imperialists want to get money out of the Pope. It would be the least to be feared, if he could pay, and be safe; but they will very soon extort more money. Wolsey foretold this in his letters. Does not see what they can hope for now. When his Holiness had taken towns and reduced the enemy in Naples, and his allies were assisting him, he could not be persuaded to prosecute the war; and now they expect it, when he has restored the towns and dissolved his army, and the enemy is stronger. Thinks he will endure anything rather than resume the war. Venice, 6 April 1527. Signed.

Extracts of letters of Gregory Casale of the 1st and . . . April.

On hearing that Bourbon and the Germans refused the truce, the French and Venetian ambassadors offered three propositions to the Pope: 1, to pay the Imperialists 200,000 scudi, and submit to their demands; or, 2, to stand on his defence; or, 3, abandon himself, and let things go to the dogs. If he resolve on the second, he should take the 60,000 scudi of Salviati, and, with other sums raised from his friends, invade the kingdom of Naples, and recruit the forces of Renzo and others, which would not be difficult. As the Viceroy has very few troops, he should clap up the Viceroy in St. Angelo. The Pope would not budge, but threw the blame on the Venetians and the French. The duke of Urbino talks of engaging with the Imperialists, but no one believes him. This encourages Bourbon, who knows that neither Pope nor Venetians would hazard a battle.

On the 3rd April the prelates here made answer to the demand for money. First, kneeling on their knees, they desired the Emperor to leave his war with the Pope, but as for money for war against the Turk they were all very ready to do enough for the purpose; that they would make war themselves on the Turk, as many as he wished, finding as many men as possible, but would grant no money, lest it be turned to some other use. He answered that they might well perceive how much inclined he was to the peace by his behaviour to the French king. They well know what charge and trouble to him has been the result, and he has always offered himself ready to any reasonable order for the preservation of peace. He is more glad to have peace with the Pope than with any other; "but," saith he, "what will you have me to do? The Pope hath by process given from me the realm of Sicily, and made viceroy thereof the duke of Lorraine, and likewise is about to take Naples from me and Milan. Would you counsel me to suffer

As the Emperor's answer was short, went to Almain to complain of it. He said, "We must maintain the authority of our ambassador, and leave something to him." I said, "You give us no answer touching your secret instructions." He said that the Emperor put his whole trust in the King and Wolsey, and that if the latter would serve him all would be right. "But you must beware that you trust not the French king too much; for he mocketh you as he hath done us." On this he plucked out of his bosom a letter received out of France the night before, written by Perot, the orator in France, containing these words: "The French king said to me, 'The king of England would have me to take his daughter, and give him Boleyn. Nay, nay?' The Cardinal wrote to me, desiring and most instantly beseeching me that, for a continuance of new unity between the king of England and me, I should send my orators into England, and give them mandatum to common and conclude there; and, to color the thing, that I should ask the daughter of England. But I had much liefer that the Emperor would send a gentleman hither, that we may common our matters among ourselves; for I would not have it concluded at the king of England's hands. They say in England that I shall come thither, and that all the triumph is prepared for the French king. True it is, for it is for the duke of Richmond, whom they intend to make king of Ireland; and that at length he shall be for the French king, as Scotland is." He further said that Francis would not give us a foot of land nor marry the Princess. Some of this he said by word of mouth. He said that Francis was hated by his subjects, and did not dare come to Paris, and that some of his privy chamber were friends of Bourbon. "Yet, for all this, I well perceive that they would in any wise the marriage should go forward between my lady Eleanor and the French king; and they are sending letters to don Inigo in which Francis calls her 'wife,' and his mother

When we commended of a wife for the duke of Richmond, he said "that in no wise we may [leave]* the daughter of my lady Eleanor, because of the treaty of Madrid;" and he named the daughters of Denmark. He told me it was said that the King desired Francis to send four of his privy chamber to remain with him, and he would send four in their place. Thinks there is no further communication between the two courts. They have prevented all communication between Francis and the Swiss. Extracts from the letters of the prothonotary Casale, of the 6th and 9th of April.

Some of the Venetians think it would be the best thing for them to make truce with the Emperor, but, as far as he can tell, the Signory have determined to do nothing without the French. Both nations must increase their forces. The French in Bologna, having left a strong garrison there, marched towards Imola and Faenza, up to which places the Imperialists made incursions, and they (query, French or Imperialists?) devastated and burnt all the territory of Bologna, and took a small town called Bresighellum. It is doubtful whether they will go to Etruria, which will be difficult and dangerous, and it is thought they may come to an agreement if only money is given them. The Viceroy is at Florence, and dares not go thence to the Germans. The French and Venetians seem inclined to help the Pope, if only the Germans are willing to go to Tuscany. Part of the Venetian force has already crossed the Po. It may happen that the Viceroy will have means of obtaining money at Florence. The Pope seems to place great confidence in him, and says he has sent him to Florence solely to get the Germans thither, and to speak with Bourbon and the marquis Guasto. The Pope seems to be made secure by despair, and will apply no remedy to keep himself from ruin. It is thought money will be given to the Germans, about 150,000 cr., and that then they will gradually retreat. As far as can be seen, the Pope will adhere to the convention, but at the heaviest expense and loss. The Germans and Spaniards, in spite of their officers' efforts, have sworn not to keep the truce, but to follow up victory.

Wrote lately of the war news, but the messenger has not yet gone off. The Viceroy, after the truce with the Pope was concluded, hearing that the Germans and Spaniards under Bourbon would continue the siege of Bologna in spite of it, or attack Florence, unless offered a large sum of money besides, went thither and sent messengers to Bourbon, but has not been able to persuade them to retire. On the contrary, they have advanced to Imola and towards Forli, and were on the river Ronchus when last heard of, devastating the whole country. The damage they have done is estimated at 500,000 crowns at Rome, and to Campeggio's see of Bologna 4,000. The Legate has returned from Naples, and was received yesterday in consistory. From letters of Gregory de Casalis, 13 April.

The Pope told the Venetian ambassador that Feramosca says the Germans can be pacified with 200,000 scudi, and the Viceroy wishes to borrow the sum of the Florentines, on security. He says he will not give the Imperialists money at present. Will urge him to come to some resolution. He replied that he saw through the treason of the Imperialists, and his own ruin was the nearer the more money he gave them, but he had no power to stand on the defensive. Further, he will send the Datary into France to treat for peace or war. Thinks that this is only done to gain time, to his own ruin. The whole fault is in the Imperial captains, who could, if they liked, draw off the troops and make outrageous demands, because they have to do with the Pope, with whom they can lose nothing. I told the Datary the Pope would have no justification. The Pope wishes to see the result of the promises of the Viceroy, perilous as it is. The Viceroy has written that the abbot of Najera will visit him, and he hopes a happy conclusion. The Florentines will pay no more money for an arrangement. The Pope has told de Vaudemont he may return to France when he pleases.

Wrote on the 8th April of his communication with Almain. Stated in their common letters how Wolsey had refused to take the pension offered by the Emperor, "saying, You will none but will be free, and principally have respect to God's cause. And then Don Inachus said the Emperor well knoweth your Grace's uprightness, and hath great confidence in you." If, therefore, you were minded not to take the pension, you would not gratify the Emperor. "And then your Grace answered, Nay, refuse not, but peradventure I will take it." Almain said that you must take it, as the Emperor had much trust in you. I then showed him certain clauses in your letter, and said I trusted that the Emperor would remember the sums due to you. He said that at the conclusion of this peace the money will be paid, with additional pensions, and if you were good to the duke of Bourbon "he shall be made sure of 12,000 ducats more" of annuity. He said that he had made satisfactory arrangements for Wolsey's pension, to be paid out of the French king's money. Thinks Almain will be content if he receive less than 1,000 ducats for obtaining the arrears. He has taken his Christmas quarter pension of 1526, although he professed he would not have it as a pension. I have since found him another man. Hennege, who has received from the prior of St. Mary's 600 ducats in your Grace's behalf, complains that 2d. is lost in every ducat. Shows that this is better than receiving it direct from Spain, on account of the charges of exchange and transport. 3042 CLERK to [WOLSEY].

As I wrote in other letters to you, yesterday I was with the King, and he showed me a long process of such purposes and overtures as have been here with him, first by me and afterwards by Mr. Treasurer and me jointly: how we had induced him to forsake all practices with the Emperor, and send his ambassadors to England, where, as touching these overtures, they find very small conformity; and though they have made as large offers to your Grace as was required, yet you always found new overtures, and kept them in great uncertainty without an answer,—which was very inconvenient, especially considering the time of year, so that the opportunity for offensive action for the recovery of his children may be lost. He said, to speak frankly, he thought strange this demeanor of the King and you, especially as the offers came first on your part.

I told him that at my last conversation with him matters seemed to be well, and wondered that there should be any alteration; that he might be sure the King and you had taken measures for the delivery of his [children], and to bring about a universal peace; and asked him what were now the obstacles. "He showed me a . . . every day upon a new matter, and from . . . matters now at the last to the alternative . . . the alternative now to have the disposition . . . choice of the said alternative in the King's highness." But what pricked him most was that you would drive him to marry the Emperor's sister, whether he would or no, and that the King should be at his liberty, while he should be bound, "and . . . take no the one ne the other." He also said the King would be at liberty to desist from the offensive at his pleasure, which I did not see. "I said that I did [perceive] that much part of these matters did tend all to rem[ove] such doubts and stoppages as might let the un[iversal] peace," and exhorted him to consent to them. He said the King and you perhaps now saw what you did not at first, and, fearing the Emperor's power, were loth, perhaps unable, to consent to the invasion this year.

After much and very vehement discussion, he said that if the King and you had "any so [great] respect of delay," he wished you would speak it plainly that he might provide for himself. I had a like conversation with my Lady, who is very earnest, and thinks you do her wrong, although I can see, what they will not say plainly, the thing they fear most is, that you should seek occasions of delay, to do nothing this year but secure their assistance in the offensive. I think they will not refuse to make the King judge of the alternative, although they have raised so many objections; for they are not so much afraid of that as that you will start some other difficulty when that is granted.

As to Italy, on the 1st the Viceroy was still in Rome. Bourbon had rejected the articles concluded between the Pope and the Viceroy, and had marched with the whole camp within a mile of Bologna. The Venetians, upon the agreement between the Pope and Viceroy, withdrew their army. You will now see in what state [the lands of] the Church and Florence stand. There is no word from the Pope concerning the alteration, but there are letters from Florence desiring the King not to suffer Florence to p[erish in] this manner. The King has sent his captains in Italy "a ne . . .," and has sent to his galleys to resort thither . . . , makes all provision possible in the time, and has exhorted the Venetians to do the same. Florence is well furnished; and if they lack no stomachs, Bourbon can do the city no harm, except in the destruction of fair houses in the country. "If these men would do with . . . as they must have done with the Venetians . . . the Pope, if the appointment had holden, t . . . should be shortly at an end." Paris, x . . . Extracts from letters of the prothonotary Casale, from Venice, 15 April.

The ambassador of the duke of Milan in France writes to his master of the good offices of the Legate (Wolsey) towards him, and of the preparations made by the king of England. States that the marriage is to be concluded by the French king or his son within the year; that the king of England is bound to take up arms for the delivery of the French king's children in June, and, in case the French king changes his mind about the Princess, he is bound to pay the costs of the war and 50,000 cr. annually usque ad filios masculos ipsius principis; and that there are other articles about salt and mutual intercourse. The French king would not accept the justification of the Pope by his Nuncio, but told him that that was not the way to procure peace. If the Venetians see the Pope is really willing to defend himself and fight, they will assist him; but they will not put their troops in peril on uncertain words, nor favor him who deserted them. If the Imperialists were moderately resisted, they could not be in a worse position than the present.

They have again sent to the duke of Ferrara for provisions, but Ferrara has suffered from scarcity and plague. The Pope fears for Imola and Bologna. At the former they will not receive the garrison sent thither, from fear of Bourbon. Casale begs the Legate to send the money promised him, from which he will pay the ambassador at Venice, who supplied him while there.

In their last of the . . . wrote of the Viceroy's coming, and that, though he had made a truce, the Imperialists under Bourbon would not accept it; "[for which] cause the Viceroy went to Florence, promising to . . . the lanceknights." Being there, he sent for Cassar Farnesca and the abbot of Najera, seeing that Bourbon could not come to him, and he was afraid to go nearer the camp. The Imperialists would only agree to retire on payment of 200,000 ducats, which the Viceroy desired to borrow of the Florentines. Urged the Pope to consider "the often breaking of former appoint[ments], with the false and crudell dealing of the Imperials, viz, in b[urn]ing of churches, crucifixes, monasteries, abbeyes and houses to [the] value of a million of gold, and the matter done of two p[riests] which they took, viz, the one they burnt, the other the[y] cut off his] crown, and in his brain set a crucifix, and mak[ing] nuns to marry with the monks, and to lie with them." Advised the Pope, for these causes, to declare the [Emperor] excommunicated, and all his ministers; to write to all Christian princes for aid; and to take the 60,000 crowns which the Florentines had prepared for the Imperialists, and what the French and Venetians offered him, by which he could maintain himself in the meantime. He admitted all they said was true, and the more he yielded to the Imperialists the more they would demand of him, but said if he made war he would be the sooner ruined, and he was advised rather to make an ill appointment.

Yesterday the Pope said he had heard from the Viceroy that he had got the Imperialists to be content with 60,000 ducats at this time, to be increased to 130,000 at the end of May; which, he says, are much better terms than he was offered before. Advised him, if he must condescend to this appointment, to pay them nothing till they had withdrawn from his territory, as Bourbon seems to be guided by the duke of Ferrara, who is intent on having Modena. It is also rumored that the Emperor has revoked the Viceroy's commission, and committed everything to Bourbon. Think that, if the pence were made generally, the Emperor could not withdraw the lanceknights and Spaniards from Italy without the consent of all other princes. Rome, 16 April. Signed.

Wolsey will learn the news by their common letters. When they urged the Emperor to order that the peace should be treated in England only, telling him it would be difficult otherwise to come to a conclusion, he said he was so desirous of peace that he sought it everywhere. When they urged that this was not to the King's honor, he said the King had no interest in it if he was not a party. As to the deposit of Milan, he said the King was too far off from Italy. When he said he could not trust the Pope or the French king, we answered that, if he waited for that, peace would never be made, and that it was best to accept the King's mediation. As to the particulars of the peace, he only said his ambassador had hitherto descended further to particulars than the confederates, and whenever they went further he would.

In their interview with Nassau they said the great services done by the King to the Emperor in time past ought to prevent any suspicion arising from the aid of 25,000 or 30,000 ducats granted by Henry to the Pope; that war could not be maintained with such a sum; and that, if the King had intended it, things would not have been now in their present state. It is not our fault that you have not received an answer to my instructions. Wrote for an answer before he came, and received a written reply from the Emperor, "omnibus fuisse satisfactum," and the same answer has since been repeated in writing, which they have sent in duplicate to Wolsey. Writes in cipher, as requested, and in another letter, his opinion of what Wolsey writes about. Have been again with the Emperor for a more particular answer, in consequence of the hope given them by John Almain; but his Majesty referred us to what he had said before, and said he was writing more fully to his ambassador. Those who were called hither about the subsidy to be given to the Emperor against the Turks have taken leave and begun to depart. Their conclusion seems to be that the Emperor should first make peace with other princes, especially the Pope. News has come today by Lyons of an eight months' truce between the Pope and the Emperor. "Ex libris D. Wigorniensis die xvj. Aprilis datis."

The Emperor in their last interview seemed unusually gloomy and exasperated (asper). He did not willingly give us audience. He seems to care only about his own affairs; hopes much, it is said, for the union of Bourbon and the Viceroy. Have urged the Emperor, in his own justification, to come to particulars, as the confederates had done, that peace may be concluded at once. He said his justification was before the world, and he desired to know what the confederates had proposed, as he was more ready to hear than to speak. Said the confederates were willing to refer everything to the King's arbitration. This the Emperor disputed, though we appealed to their commissions. Could get nothing out of him, but he kept saying it was only trifling to propose that a league should be first arranged against the Turks, and peace concluded afterwards. He seemed to make little of what was said about the 2,000,000, and before we spoke of terms of payment said he was surprised Wolsey considered he was acting for him in this, because, with the exception of some small matters, the French king had repeatedly promised to observe the treaty of Madrid, and also to satisfy the king of England. He also made little of what was said of the hope of Bourbon being restored by the French king, as if he were sure of it. He added that it was no use tempting him, because he would not be allured even by 10,000,000, much less 2,000,000. Could not get him to explain his meaning in this. Thinks, however, he has no idea at present of letting go the sons of the French king. When we told him the reply made to the French ambassadors in England about the marriage, he made no answer, as if he had either been informed already, or did not believe it.

No preparations seem to be made as yet for going into Italy. Nothing, they say, is done even about the galleys. Does not believe there is any intelligence between the Emperor and Francis, nor much between the Emperor and the Pope. The Cortes have refused money. It is said that some individuals offer a contribution of 50,000 ducats. Have spoken in their common letters about Nassau's words. Do not know whether it was done from some arrangement with the Emperor, as they have not seen the latter lately, and therefore can say nothing of his intentions touching his coronation, or England, &c. Does not change his opinion about him from Allemen's conversation with Lee, and thinks the true state of his feelings towards the King can be guessed from what they have written already in their letters of the 31 Jan., and likewise from the report of his threats to Russell (minutum esse Rossellum) and other circumstances. Thinks the Emperor has not changed his mind touching his coronation in Italy; and though Allemen says that he is placable,* I cannot believe it when I compare his deeds with his words.

3051. LEE and GHINUCCI to [WOLSEY].

Bluemantle arrived on the 7th with Wolsey's letters. Asked for an audience on the 8th, but Almain had not deciphered their letters from don Inigo. Sent again on the 9th, and were promised an audience between 12 and 1; but, on coming, were asked to put it off till next day, as the Emperor was busy. Almain said he was not yet "recovered of his late sickness of some murr' and little fever." On obtaining audience at last, Worcester began by excusing the error "made by reason that they, otherwise than they promised to Mr. Almoner, sent not the secret instructions by Echingham;" then declared the "purpose" of the French ambassadors, and the answers made to them. On the first topic the Emperor answered that he would have been much surprised if don Inigo had done anything otherwise than he might avow, adding that he was glad to learn the King and Wolsey were now satisfied with him. Touching the thanks given by the French ambassadors to Henry for interceding for the French king's deliverance, he said, "The King my uncle did therein like a good and noble prince; but I that let him go have had much business and much displeasure thereby; albeit I am well content for so much as thereby I declared that no impediment of the universal peace should stand by me." He said he was quite ready to deliver the Dauphin and his brother, if the French king did what he ought. Told him Wolsey had good hopes of inducing Francis to give 2,000,000 cr. in lieu of Burgundy; on which the Emperor said the French had already offered him more, and he had refused it. Told him the French denied having ever made such an offer, and Wolsey expected that they would rather increase than diminish it. The Emperor said, from past experience he could not trust the French, and expected they would deceive both the King and him. "Nay," saith he, "I have good pledges, and to them I will trust." Told him, if he would descend to particulars, he might have all reasonable assurance. "He said, They come to no particularities; putting hereto, First of all, let us entreat of an universal peace, and war to be made against the Turk." We said that would be useless until the particular quarrels between princes were first arranged.

Urged him, as he had declared he would not stick upon the demand of Burgundy, to say what he would require in lieu of it. He said, "It is not two millions that can move me herein, ne ten millions, ne money; but surety of continuance of peace is the thing I most desire, and that we may set all our powers against the Turk without fear. And in this behalf I am much annoyed and slandered in my mind, seeing there is no faith. The French king hath deceived me, so that I cannot trust his promise; and the Pope, on the other side, have given away my kingdom of Cile to my vassal, Senior de Valdemonte, and to the same the governance of Naples; which dealing may make me not take him as Pope, no, not for all the excommunications that he can make; for I stand under appellation to the next general council. He somewhat smiled in this speaking, but yet he seemed therein to be somewhat stirred and moved." In the end he said he would take further deliberation, and make us answer.

As to the Frenchmen's third overture, touching universal peace, "he said, I think they mean not as they say. Where it was said that the King's highness and your Grace hath good hope that they will be conformable to all reason, as the King and your Grace shall think; at this word he said, Will they so? Will they do as the King my uncle will have them? here stopping. We gathered that he meant that then he would do as much." We said the King and you had written that their commission was ample and sufficient. To the fourth, touching the marriage of my lady Princess, he said the King might easily judge whether they desired it for his profit or their own. Francis had said he was in no way bound to take the Queen his sister, because the Emperor had been required to deliver her when he delivered his sons into Spain, and had refused. But he denied that he was bound to deliver her until the whole treaty of Madrid was ratified. In answer to their assurance that nothing would be done about the marriage prejudicial to his interest, he thanked the King much, and said he had full confidence in him.

He promised that Sforza should have justice, but would not take Milan from Bourbon if Sforza were found in default, making a general answer to the proposal to put it in the King's hands, that he would make further answer. Pressed him to resolve himself soon, that there might be no more need of sending couriers up and down, as Christendom stood in much danger. He answered "that he knew well in what state they be; and no further word then to this thing."

Said it would be a dishonor to the King if this treaty, so well begun in England, should be broken off by secret practices elsewhere. He said he had sent a commission to Rome which he could not revoke, and avowed he would rather have the treaty here than anywhere else, and rather in England than at Rome. When told that the king of England might think himself illused after he had undertaken to mediate at the Emperor's request, he said, "The King my uncle did first offer himself." In the end he said he would consider everything, and give us answer with all speed. Told him he would get more by putting confidence in the King than any other way; in proof of which, we were commanded to tell him that, if there were any prince of his Majesty's blood worthy to have her in marriage, the King would sooner bestow my lady Princess on him than elsewhere; but as he knew of no such prince unmarried, he proposed to give the duke of Richmond, "who is near of his blood and of excellent qualities, and is already furnished to keep the state of a great prince, and yet may be easily by the King's means exalted to higher things," to some noble princess of near blood to the Emperor, to strengthen the bond between them. To this he only said he was much bound to the King, "and would think and call to his remembrance such one of his high blood."

Went next to Nassau, to whom they gave, uncommissioned, the King's commendations, and urged him, as being the King's sure friend, to get such an answer given as would promote continuance of amity. He said no one would be gladder of peace than himself, for by this war he lost much, and he knew the negotiations could be best carried on in England; adding, however, that the King's giving money to the Pope was not consistent with the office of a mediator. Answered that it was only to relieve his Holiness, not to maintain war. Told him of the King's inclination to an alliance by marriage and league. This, he said, was worth many 25,000 ducats, and he promised to do his best to advance the amity. After dinner Lee went to Almain to see what could be gathered from him. Perceived somewhat by his answers that he could not otherwise have discovered. In speaking of the 2,000,000, "what is, saith he, 100,000 millions without surety? We cannot trust the Frenchmen." As to the Princess's marriage, he said it could not be, because of the pre-contract between Francis and the lady Eleanor, which there was nothing wanting to complete but solemnization and consummation, "which had been done saith he, if we had not dissuaded it." He said the French king was not sincere. "We could be content, if it might be, that he had the Princess; but for my part, because I am a good Englishman, if you let her go so, I would be right sorry. Except for her, you might have aforehand your old inheritance, Normandy, Gascony, and Guienne. And I tell you, saith he, get you these into your hands into real possession, and I promise you we shall for you defend these countries with 10,000 horsemen and 50,000 footmen." He advised that the Princess should wait and see how the world went:—"Peradventure the Imperatrice may die, and then is a marriage meet for you;"—and he regretted that she was ever refused "for this Portugalesse, by whom we can have no help, and our money that we had with her is all gone." Could not forbear asking him why they refused the Princess. He said the Emperor was promised 900,000 ducats for the journey of Italy if he would marry the daughter of Portugal. And now, said Lee, the promoters of that marriage seem not very toward when the Emperor calls on them for help. Almain shook his head.

Asked him what he thought about the duchy of Milan. He said Sforza had clearly lost it by all law and conscience; there was too much matter against him, and, sentence being once pronounced, the Emperor had covenanted to give it to Bourbon; that the King could not keep it, and that it would cost 100,000 angelots more than its revenues. He insisted that the Duke would die for sorrow if it were placed in deposito. He said the Pope was the cause that he had it, and doubtless would be glad if it were given him, especially if he would marry the Pope's kinsman as was now moved.

On his asking what marriage he thought meet for the duke of Richmond, Lee said he had little knowledge of the Emperor's blood. Almain asked what he thought of the queen of Denmark's daughters. Lee said he had no commission to speak of any person, but he had heard that the dowager of Portugal had a daughter. Almain said she was promised to the Dauphin by the treaty of Madrid. Lee said, "If the marriage quail with the mother, by all likelihood you may seek another Dauphin for the daughter? What age is she?" He answered, Six years of age. O, said I, age most convenient for us, in my mind! He said, I know well why you would so fain have her:—because she shall have to her marriage 300,000 doubloons." Lee said this could not have moved him, for he did not know it, nor did he think the King would be moved by money. He seemed anxious for a new league, and said, don Inigo had a large commission to treat in England. Forgot that he said touching the duke of Richmond, "We will offer you no bastard." The Emperor hath bestowed one with the heir of the duke of Ferrara, and gave with her the county of Carpio, worth 10,000 ducats a year, and yet we have another born in Spain."

Inquired indirectly whether there were any secret practices anywhere else. He said, "Some say we have sent commission ad tractandum in Gallia. We be not so mad; ne unto Rome we have sent further commission than to entreat de treugis; but they have no commission ad tractandum de pace," adding that we might be assured the peace would be concluded only in England. Urged him, in conclusion, to procure us a good and speedy answer; which he said we should have, but that the Emperor would reserve some of his mind to his ambassador in England. He said that the marriage between the French king and Eleanor "had never passed, but only by that means to have Burgonne again." He said the Emperor would not go into Italy for the next three years, as it would be dangerous. Told him that the Emperor was very much obliged to Wolsey for furthering his interests with the King, and that he could not oblige the writers in anything, except in expressing his satisfaction with their conduct. When he said that 2,000,000 was too little, they replied that if less was given, it was important it should be paid at once.

Sir Will. Paston has indicted a great number of the King's tenants in Great Yarmouth for three several riots, which he alleges to have been committed on the common pasture of Cayster Bardolff, Norf., in the 16th, 17th, and 18th years of the King. If such riots had actually taken place, it was Paston's duty, being one of the next justices of the peace, along with Clere, "the other next justice," and the sheriff, to have sat and inquired thereon. Has dwelt these six years at his poor lodging of Ormysby Hall, within two miles of the scene, and has frequently had intercourse with Paston during the period, but never heard him speak of it. The petitioners served as bailiffs of Great Yarmouth in 17 Hen. VIII., and being, by authority of the King's charters, also justices of the peace, made Humph. Wyngfyld and John Harvy justices of the "coram" (quorum). With them were associated that year John Palmer, John Barton, and Harry Plumsted, who are all ready to swear there was no riot.

From letters of Gregory Casale, dated Rome, 25 April.

Cannot relate with what arguments and importunity "co[nati] simus Pontificem rursus lucri facere." The Venetian ambassador, too, has used every effort. Meanwhile letters came from Wolsey that the King could not believe such a league had been concluded by his Holiness. Showed everything to the Pope, who had nothing to object to Wolsey's arguments, and lost not a moment in making such other arrangements as he could. The old treaty (capitulatio) about Naples is not now declared, for want of time: Signor Alberto (Carpi) neglected to remind the Pope of it. Its effect is that Naples be given to one of Francis's sons, reserving a pension to the Pope. The charge which Francis was to have, to be about 4,000 foot and 400 lances. An honorable place seems to be assigned to the King, whose contribution is left to his own liberality. Then Naples is again mentioned, and the King is made judge and conservator. The Pope and the allies are bound to acknowledge a head as necessary, lest the Pope change too much henceforth, or Francis delay preparations. If these terms are observed, victory will soon follow. The Venetians, too, should give the Pope security, not because there is any fear of them, but that the Pope may give them security in turn. He might put the citadel of Ravenna and Rimini in the French king's hands.

As Wolsey has written for Russell's recall, we have advised that the Datary be not sent to France or England. Russell will discharge his mission to Francis, and perhaps more faith will be given to him than to the Datary. He will warn Francis, if he see fit, not to hurt his own interests by delay, as he would have done; and that the obstinacy of the Germans made the Pope return and take our part. Langesais, who promised the Pope 20,000 cr., now says he has only 10,000. Signor Lorenzo has asked us to supply the other 10,000. We said we had no commission to do so, but would endeavor to raise the amount in our own names by money and mortgages, lest any suspicion be given to the Pope in this first payment. The Pope does not think it advisable that the treaty should speak of capturing the Viceroy and the other lords; but we will do our best to bind him to it. He asked us to be with him tomorrow, probably about Russell's despatch. Nothing can be more ugly than to see these wretched Germans; "quod si diligentius occurratur, omnia bene succedent."

As the truce made by the Pope with the Imperialists, with a view to the peace of Christendom, had not taken the desired effect, and his confederates had urged that there would be no security against the trickery of the Imperialists, except by recourse to arms, the Pope hereby revokes the conditions made with the Viceroy and others, and renews the union which existed between himself and them, especially in all matters which pertain to the king of England and cardinal Wolsey.

1. Arrangements for carrying on the war in Italy and beyond the mountains. 2. Contributions to be made by the Venetians, and the French king to meet the increased forces of the Imperialists and their fleet. 3. The troops to be posted wherever there is the greatest need, and aid to be given to Tuscany. 4. The nature of the ships to be furnished by Francis. 5. Arrangements for the kingdom of Naples, in the event of its being recovered. 6. Declaration by the Pope that it has been forfeited by the Emperor. 7. Received his letters of the 20 March, "advertising us [how your Grace had heard] by the Venetians' ambassador, of the Pope's appointment consent and procurement being present, whereof as well the [said] French king's and Venetians' ambassadors here knoweth the [truth], as your Grace may perceive by our continual advertisements [if they] be come to your hands." Has not exceeded his instructions about the delivery of the money, for the French had delivered theirs three days before, and had no little suspicion of the Pope that they delivered another sum eight days after. The Pope was inclined to a new league, even before Wolsey's letters arrived, so that the capitulation enclosed was agreed to by all the ambassadors. "The first demand and appointment that the [Viceroy] made here with the Pope was of 60,000 ducats, and after [he] departed to Florence toward the camp to cause Bourbon ac[ord] to the same, which [he] would not do, but demanded 100,000 and while they treated further they asked 150,000 ducats, [and] now increasing are come to 300,000 ducats, and that at the furthest to be paid in six days, whereof the Viceroy should pay 80,000 ducats, who hath always showed to have gladly and directly willed the accord with great words and promises, as well in favor of the Pope as in the displeasure of Bourbon." He has now, however, retired to Senes, for fear of the Almains, as he says, but as we think to get out of the Pope's hands, for he might have been as safe in Florence.

It is a great thing to have conquered the Pope's timidity, and "returned him into the war." He desires them to say that, with the aid of the King and Wolsey, and the French king, on whom he relies, he will spend "the uttermost he may make." As he could not spare the Datary, he desired Russell to return, and to declare to the French king in passing the Pope's necessity. Will set out five or six days after he has seen these matters in good train. The Pope's poverty is unfeigned. He has within these two days been applying to all his friends in Rome, and cannot raise 4,000 ducats, and without speedy help from France he will lose his reputation in Italy. Send a letter from the Pope's camp touching the state of the Imperial army, and a letter in Latin about the well-disposed condition of the League, which it may help the treaties of peace for Wolsey to show the Imperial ambassador. The general goes shortly to Spain, and the Pope sends one with him to complain of the deceit which his men practise against him. They are worse than Turks, committing outrages on monks, nuns, and priests, and desecrating the host at this time of Easter, "when men should have received their Maker." Such enormities were never practised as by this company of Lutherans and Marrinines. Thinks, if the universal peace were concluded, the Emperor has no power to order them out of Italy. 3066. RUSSELL and SIR GREG. CASALE to [WOLSEY].

The Pope has labored hard for peace, and has incurred much discredit. Owing to the perversity of the Spaniards and Germans, he has been compelled to accept this truce, as you will see by the capitulation we send. He is, however, very anxious for war, and is strongly supported in this by his friends and the populace. The Imperialists will not be able to make a stand much longer. The Viceroy is anxious for a truce, seeing his perils, and is consequently at variance with Bourbon. The Swabians and Spaniards commit horrible atrocities. They have burned houses to the value of 200,000,000 ducats, all the churches, images, and priests that fell into their hands. They compelled the priests and monks to violate the nuns. Wherever they were received without opposition they burned the place. They did not spare the boys, and carried off the girls; and whenever they found the sacrament of the Church, they threw it into a river, or the vilest place they could find. If God does not punish such cruelty and wickedness, we shall infer that he does not trouble himself about the affairs of this world. Are anxious that the King and Wolsey should remonstrate with the Emperor. Wo to us, wo to the Emperor, if these Germans and Spaniards get the upper hand! If they once march into Naples, they will not easily be satisfied. Rome, 26 April 1527. Signed.

Wrote last on the 12th of an ambassador of the king of Poland sent to the king of Bohemia (Ferdinand) for a peace between him and Wavoda. The King will not accept it; but has made a truce till the middle of June. Has visited the queen of Hungary at Presburgh, and presented her the King's commendations; also a letter from the Queen, expressing anxiety to have assisted her. When she heard that she fell a-weeping, and expressed her thanks, and her hopes that the King would assist her brother Ferdinand. Gives an account of the news respecting Hungary; the supposed death of the Turk, and of a Moor, who claimed to be emperor of Constantinople. Canvasses the chances of Ferdinand's success.

Arrived at the Court on St. George's even. The King took the Queen with him to the Cathedral next day to do honor to the Garter. I declared to him the effect of the King's letter. He asked me how the King had styled the Waywode, and very much disliked my going to him. He desired that I should wait till he heard from England. It is certain he will not let me go to Hungary. I urged upon him to labor with the Emperor for a universal peace. Dr. Fabre, who was with Salamancka in England, has made a good report of the King and you. Ferdinand has gone towards Prague. [Speech of one of Ferdinand's councillors to Wallop.]

"Magnifice domine orator." Ferdinand thanks the king of England for the kindness shown in his letters and in the ambassador's credence, and for his spontaneous offer of assisting the orthodox Faith, which is in danger, restoring the once famous kingdom of Hungary, and revenging the slaughter of the late King, especially as he is the furthest removed from the common enemy of Christendom. Ferdinand has turned all his strength to the protection of the frontier. He assisted Nandor Alba (Belgrade) while it was besieged, and has preserved to the present time the remains of the kingdom of Croatia, at great expense to himself; and he begs the King to act upon his intentions. As to the other part of his charge, that he is sent to the king of Hungary who has succeeded on the death of king Lewis, informs him that Ferdinand is the true and legitimate king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia. The Vayvode has seized the crown, contrary to all laws and customs, and to the injury of the royal family. He anticipated the lawful assembly convened by the Palatine by assembling another, and threatening those who did not appear, though he gave such short notice that not even the inhabitants of the adjacent provinces could be present. The forum was surrounded by his own guards, and he was elected by their clamors, not by any votes. Ferdinand, however, although the kingdom is his by right, preferred to be chosen by a free election. Since the death of St. Stephen, first king of Hungary, all offices have been in the gift of the King, except that of the Palatine, which is awarded by vote of the prelates and barons. At the King's death he holds the royal castles, convokes the assembly for the election of a new king, and himself has the first vote, is lieutenant when the King is absent, and captain-general in war. After the death of Lewis the Palatine accordingly convoked an assembly, and explained that, in consequence of the devastation and destitution of the country, it was necessary to have a powerful king to recover what was lost, and to resist any future attempts of the Turks, and that Ferdinand seemed the only one fit among neighboring princes. Ferdinand's ambassadors were then heard in support of his claim, and produced treaties between Frederic emperor of Rome and Matthias king of Hungary, and between Maximilian and Wla-dislaus, leaving the kingdom to the heirs of Maximilian if the King died without heirs, but giving the Hungarians leave to choose among the heirs of the former, if there were more than one; and they promised that, if he were elected, he would govern according to law, and would turn all his strength to the recovery of Nador Alba and the defence of the kingdom. The ambassadors of Mary queen of Hungary then spoke concerning the old customs of Hungary, and their adherence to the royal family, showing that since 1310 all the kings except Matthias succeeded by the female line. Ferdinand, therefore, ought to succeed in right of his wife Anne, as kings Alba and Albert and the emperor Sigismund succeeded by a like title. They then advised the Estates to consider the power of the Emperor and Ferdinand, and to accept their favor and assistance, for Ferdinand could not and would not neglect his rights, especially as his subjects urge him to assert them; and they promised the Queen's influence in favor of her brothers. When this had been heard and discussed, Ferdinand was elected, and ambassadors were sent to invite him to take possession of the kingdom, which he would have done immediately if he had not been obliged to go to Bohemia to be crowned. The English ambassador will, therefore, see that Ferdinand is lawfully elected, and he should not hesitate to treat with him, according to his instructions. Ferdinand will show him all favor, and they may conclude what will be beneficial to all Christendom and glorious to both Kings.

Letters from the duke of Tuscany to his ambassador in France, 27 A[pril].

Have been visited by the Viceroy. Are compelled to accede to his terms in consequence of the delay in their aids from Venice. He has gone to visit Bourbon, who has always shown a fair face; but from his letters intercepted by us his deceit is apparent, and he wishes to attack and burn Florence. Unwilling as we are to speak evil of princes, these designs square exactly with the character of Bourbon; and, though he will thereby receive no advantage, he is willing to betray Tuscany to the Lutherans. Bourbon hopes by undermining the Viceroy to become Caesar's lieutenant in Italy, and has struck up a great friendship with the marquis of Mantua and the duke of Ferrara. We are resolved to defend ourselves. The convention between the Pope and the Viceroy has been very prejudicial, and we have been compelled to confirm it through necessity, intending, as soon as it is expired, to recur to arms. We hope for assistance from France. The Swiss and the soldiers under Saluzzi must be paid. The Venetians must be urged to send speedy relief, and Peter of Navarre to assist us with his fleet. The enemy are near Anghelero to the number of 18,000 foot and 3,500 horse. Arrangements for defence. The duke of Urbino is at Bologna, and, to make him more energetic, we propose to give him St. Leo. The Pope has been compelled to change his intentions of sending the bishop of Verona to England. When Bourbon and the Germans were informed of the arrangement between the Pope and the Viceroy they opposed it, and, treating it with contempt, burned the towns in Bologna, and plundered everywhere; then, advancing into Tuscany, and camping twelve miles from Florence, they intended, when that was done, to lay siege to Rome. The Pope has been compelled to put himself on the defensive. His enemies are partly Lutherans and partly Marrans, who care as much to destroy religion itself as to trample on Italy. From the letters of the signory [of Venice], 25 April.

Nothing could be more pleasing to them than the movements arising out of the suspension of arms between the Pope and Viceroy; and his recent letters about the goodwill of the King and Cardinal, confirm their hopes of a good end. The march of the captain general across the Apennines, to join the marquis of Saluzzo, and assist the Florentines, will be more successful if the assistance from the French and English kings arrives, and the latter joins the treaty; which alone, they think, can save Italy and all Christendom. The Emperor would then be more easily forced to peace, and his troops in Italy scattered without trouble.

Send a copy of a letter in cipher from Bourbon to Ant. de Leva, dated S. Peter in Balneo, 19 April, which they wish him to show to the King and Wolsey, and beg their assistance.

ii. Bourbon's intercepted letter.

Has arrived at S. Peter in Balneo. Will lose no time on the march, as the enemy are unprepared. His army is short of corn, but bear everything, longing for the plunder of Florence. Wishes Leva to attempt something where he is.

iii. From letters of the Signory, 30 April.

The duke of Urbino has crossed the Alps and arrived at Florence, in time to pacify a sedition which began on the 26th. The city is very grateful, and preparing for defence. The Venetian and French army was about to encamp in some place suitable for the defence of Florence. The enemy are 26 miles from the city. The Viceroy, having left Sienna, obtained 17 cannons for the Spanish army, which shows his mind towards the Pope. Two days ago received letters from their ambassador at the court, that the Pope has renewed the first treaty with them, and that their ambassador has given assent, although without authority, as the Pope and the French ambassadors were very eager for him to do so.

For the sake of the Church and Florence, would have endured any load they could bear; but some of the conditions are even harder than those in the first treaty. Enclose them to be shown to the King and Wolsey. Their expences have been increasing, and they can hardly support them. Their captain has just crossed the Alps. They have a fleet at sea, and a new army for the defence of Lodi and Bergamo, towards which places Ant. de Leva is hastening. Have written on the subject to their ambassador in France, and they think that Francis, on whom the articles press equally will not approve of them. Russell has endeavored to dissuade the Pope

Extract of a letter from the prothonotary Casale, dated Venice, 30 April.

Sends a copy of the new capitulation entered into by the Pope. The Signory have not yet resolved about it, as far as Casale can tell, but they are pleased with the good intentions which the Pope has resumed. They are not unwilling to assist the Pope with money, but they wish to pay it themselves, as he needs it, lest he should use it for attacking towns and territories, and either recommence war or make peace without the consent of the others, as he lately did with regard to the places taken in the kingdom (Naples) by the allied forces. They think the Pope ought to be bound to provide money, which is not the case in the new capitulation, which says generally that he will do all he can. This does not please them, but it will easily be arranged. It is very necessary that this new capitulation should succeed.

Asked them last night to determine, as delay was dangerous. Was told that two ambassadors had come from the Florentines to make arrangements with them, offering to provide 10,000 foot. The Venetian forces have therefore crossed the mountains to assist the Florentines, and the Signory seems inclined to trust them rather than the Pope, and will conclude their obligations with them first, lest they should make the agreement with the Pope a pretext for evading other treaties, as they are not distinctly bound to anything either in the treaty with the Pope or the Viceroy; they do not think the Pope can rule the Florentines, as a new tumult has arisen there.

Letters from Florence of the 26th April state that the three Cardinals and Hippolitus de Medici went out of the town to meet the duke of Urbino, who was on his way thither; and in their absence several of the citizens seized the palace, and refused to give it up when the Duke and the others entered the town, unless liberty was promised them. They had detained Frederic Bozolo and other captains, and began to fire on the forces who kept the forum. The Duke then ordered guns to be placed against the palace; and the people seeing this, and that there were more troops than they dared resist, began to call out, "Gallia, Gallia, Marcus, Marcus," and demanded merely liberty, and to be freed from the administration of the Medici, which they treated for through Bozolo. The Venetians, therefore, think that Florence was preserved for the Pope and the Medici by their means; but they do not think his Holiness has much power there. The Venetian ambassador at Rome writes that the Pope has determined to create cardinals, that he may the easier defend himself. The French ambassador here thinks his master will not easily admit all the recent capitulations of the Pope. The duke of Urbino, after a long consultation with the Florentine lords, determined to march out of the town, and go as near to Bourbon as he could, and not to lose any opportunity.

Chancery. He has the copy of Robt. Oxenbrige's will, late the husband of Lacy's wife, of which Sir Godard is executor.

The bearer is his cousin Ric. Lacy, soldier of Calais. Has sent a book of the behavior of his wife, who has left him and gone to Master Stok, her daughter's husband.

She says she will complain to the King and Wolsey, being supported by lord Mountjoy, Sir Wm. Kingston and Walter Walche. She never regards the trouble Lacy has had about her property and lands, which he has increased 30*l.* a year. Oye, six miles from Calais, 30 April 1527.

30 April. 3080. FRANCIS I. and HENRY VIII.

R. O.
Du Mont, iv.
pt. 1, 476.

1. Treaty concluded by Gabriel bp. of Tarbes, Francis viscount of Turenne, Anthony le Viste lord de Fresnes, John Joachim de Passano lord de Vaulx, and Thomas duke of Norfolk, Charles duke of Suffolk, Thomas Bolen viscount Rochefort, Sir William Fitzwilliam, Treasurer of the Household, and Sir Thomas More, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster.

(1.) Nothing in this treaty to invalidate the treaty of More, 30 Aug. 1524, between Louise, then regent of France, and the said Princes. (2.) Neither party to treat with Charles the Emperor elect, about the ransom of Francis's sons, or Henry's rights, without common consent. (3.) Two ambassadors to be sent to the Emperor to treat for the deliverance of Francis's sons and payment of money due to Henry. (4.) Princess Mary, Henry's daughter, to be married either to Francis or his second son, Henry duke of Orleans. (5 and 7.) Within a month after the marriage is determined on, the treaty of perpetual peace of this date shall be ratified. (6 and 8.) If Mary or her children succeed not to the English throne, or if the war against Charles be not carried on, the said treaty shall be void. (9.) If the Emperor refuse the conditions offered by the allies, or if he detain their ambassadors, a summons of war shall be sent him. (10.) Though the marriage do not take place, Francis shall pay Henry's expences in the war, and shall deliver to him, within the months of May, June, and July, black salt to the value of 15,000 g. crowns, the crown being equal to 35*s.* of Tours, &c. (11.) If Henry hinder the marriage, Francis is not bound to pay the expences of the war; or if Francis hinder the marriage, he is bound to pay Henry double the expences. (12.) Concerning the meeting of the two Kings at Calais;—it is not to be so pompous and costly as the former one. (13.) This treaty to be ratified with a month. Then are recited Francis and Henry's commissions to the persons above named. [Said to be] signed and sealed by the French commissioners. Westminster, 30 April 1527. Signed by the bishop of Tarbes and Le Viste.

Tuslet, 1. 62.

Since writing, was sent for on Sunday by the King, who asked me if we had informed Francis of what he had ordered Wolsey to tell us about the queen of Scotland's intention of going to France. He said he was much ashamed of his sister's folly and misconduct. I said he might be sure Francis would receive no one against his wishes, and certainly not one of her character, considering what he had said, and that I was certain Francis would make oath to that effect, considering the union between the King and him; for when he was a prisoner you had told me it was needful to gain Henry's entire friendship, as there was no prince in Christendom more virtuous or honorable. I followed the memorandum about the marriage of your niece, because the Pope remains opposed to it (reste révolté); and I know the King would rather have her for his bastard son, which, I think, would be to your great disadvantage, as then they would do for him in France whatever he desired. He said he was very glad of the high opinion you had of him, and, notwithstanding the trouble you had given him in Scotland, he also considered you a good and wise prince; that he would endeavor to remove his sister from having any control over his nephew, as she was incompetent to exercise it, and he was old enough to govern for himself, and that the worst fear he had of you when you were in Scotland was on his nephew's account. I replied that nothing could tempt you to do anything against your conscience, and that as to the government of the country you only wished that it should be put in good order by his advice, and a number of men removed who eat it up and ruin it. He said that many things had been badly done there, but I assure you that he would like far better that it should be governed as if you remained there (ainsi que si vous y restiez).

The matter of the King (Francis) is concluded, and seems to me as well assured on this side as can be, and if the Emperor will not come to reason England will make war upon him, for which preparation has already been made. Henry sends an ambassador to Spain, along with the one sent by Francis, with joint instructions to summon the Emperor to liberate the children, or declare war against him, for which purpose two heralds go with them. Henry wishes a great effort to be made this year from Italy and from England. He would send men to Calais, and Francis would strengthen his garrisons, and keep up the war all this season and winter, and in summer get ready an army of 30,000 foot and 1,500 horse, and 1,500 men-at-arms, and begin the campaign in May. He wishes the Italian army to be reinforced, and battle given to Bourbon. He says he would be ready to furnish 100,000 crowns, and would like Francis to send a good chief, saying that the marquis of Saluces was not competent. I asked whom he would like sent, and he said Lautrec, whom he thought better than you, because the Italians did not like him, though he commended your wisdom and experience. London, 1 May.

P.S.—As the interview between the King and Francis is to take place, and Wolsey will go before to conclude it, when I suppose you will be present, I shall leave on Tuesday next on my return to France.

2 May. 3089. GREGORY CASALE to RUSSELL.
Nrs. B. vi. 37.

R.M.

The Pope performed tonight what he promised this morning, viz., taking money (touché argent). Of the newly made cardinals the archbishop of Ravenna has been the first to furnish money. Cannot send their names till tomorrow. Thinks he has already answered what Russell writes about. Has laboured incessantly with the Pope, advising him to remain here and defend himself, which he has resolved to do. They are in want of corn, and it has been advised that the galleys bring corn to Hos[ita]. This need not detain Russell. Andrea Doria will give him one of his galleys. Rome, 2 May.

News came on Tuesday of a disturbance at Florence, created by 10 gentlemen (some of them being of the Salviati and Strozzi), who went to the Lords of the town, and made them sign a capitulation, changing the government and giving Bourbon 50,000 cr. This done, the tocsin was sounded, and the people assembled; but on hearing the matter every one went home. "Ses conjurez ny feiren[t] le tumulte à l'heure que touz les cardinaulx et capitaines estoient allez hors de Florence a lencontre du due d'Urbyn." Four hundred foot only remained in the town, who came to the place, told the gentlemen they were fools, and bid them go home. This was on Friday. On the Saturday Bourbon retired to Pianza, 90 miles from Rome, and the light horse of Sienna went to Acquapendente, and demanded the town in Bourbon's name. An ambassador from Bologna, named Vianeze, went to Campeggio weeping, who immediately sent away his children and furniture, greatly to the Pope's dissatisfaction, who says, "qu'il en perlera son ordinaire," and that it had greatly intimidated the town. The Pope has done all he could to fortify and victual the places which can be easily held.

Yesterday came news of the 30th ult., that Bourbon had not yet moved, and that he was quite disheartened that the artillery was out of Sienna, "venant gaillardement." Seccara Colonna has demanded provisions of Viterbo, telling him that the remainder of the camp was at Acquapendente, which has very much astonished the Pope. Has been to the Pope this morning, and has persuaded him that it is needful to make cardinals at once; to which he has consented. Signor Rance, as captain, provides for everything. The Pope is in great consternation. Has done what he could to rally him, Could not raise 1,000 crowns for Rance to levy 1,000 men. All my jewels have been pledged, &c., to raise 600 crowns for the purpose. Some of the cardinals have advised the Pope to retire to Civita Vecchia, as the Trans-Tiberine people were not favorable to him. The Pope has received this evening 40,000 ducats from Perugia, Gadi, and Copys, whom he will make cardinals tomorrow. It is supposed that Bourbon will come to Rome as he did to Florence, to stir the people to revolt; or else he must go to Naples:—that the troops will gladly go to Naples to unload their booty, and hold it in security for their wages, and if Bourbon plays his cards well he may gain a kingdom instead of a duchy. If the French king intends to help the Pope he must do it shortly. "Je ne [vous] escripray autrement en Angleterre si la chose va avant. Votre seigneurie me pourra escrire." I promise you I have not had a single hour's rest since you left. Rome, 2 May. Signed.

*Lettre
n. 73.*

As the French king is beginning to despair of the particular agreement which he has been treating with the Emperor, it is to be feared he will resort to war, especially if he obtains assistance from England. All hope of peace will thus be lost, and we shall be exposed to greater perils than ever. Rome, 2 May 1527.

3092. JOHN HACKETT to [WOLSEY].

*Galba, B. ix. 36.
B. M.*

Has received no letters since he last wrote. Encloses two, from lady Margaret and Salamank.

Wolsey's discreet conveyance has caused the high mind and pride of these parts to decline and suage. Has always found my Lady and ff well disposed to keep the amity. As for Mons. Hoghestrat, the treasurer general and the audiercer, which three persons are the chief rulers of the Court, has fair words from them, and offers to serve the King and Wolsey, which kindness has only come of late. The chief reason we have no news is that the lord Hoghestrat, to save the Emperor some little money, keeps no poets ordinary, and no ambassador here does. Asks Wolsey to send him money.

The earl Sallainank has made good report of the King's reception of him, and told the privy council that, if we keep our promises to him, he will have reason to make a good report to his master. This was told Hacket as a secret. Three days ago dined with Hoghestrat, who asked for news from England. Told him there was none of importance. He said he had heard that the Emperor had given Wolsey the bishopric of Burgos in Spain. Said if he had done so, he knew right well to whom he had given his gift. The lady of Meghe, who was also at dinner, said she thought the Emperor would have given the bishopric to her cousin, who is a kinsman to the said Hoghestrat. Hoghestrat then said he did not know if it was true or not, but Hacket knows that he would rather his cousin had it than Wolsey.

Is informed by a man of credit that the Emperor [is not] as well pleased with some who have the [government] here as in times past, by reason of which my Lady and Hoghestrat are sending Mona. de Rossynboya, great master of the Household, with letters and instructions to the Emperor in Spain. Lutheranism is increasing here, specially in Holland, Seiland, Brabant, and Flanders, but they dare not yet declare themselves as openly as in Dutchland. Churches and God's service are kept up here as before, but it is not so in Dutchland. Fears that unless my Lady takes some remedy, the canker will wax so great, that it will be hard to bring all to a good end. Both my Lady and Mona. de Palmero are well disposed to find some remedy. 3095. FERDINAND KING OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY to HENRY VIII.

Nero, B. 12. 77.

R. M.

Hears from the letters of his ambassador, Gabriel count of Ortenburg, and also from the King's ambassador with him, that the King does not wish his said ambassador to take any steps concerning Hungary without Ferdinand's advice. Has refused his request to go to count Scypuse, who claims to be king of Hungary, as it would be necessary to address him by that title, which would render him more obstinate, and he would spread a report that Henry recognised his claim, and would assist him. Will attend to the King's exhortations to assist in procuring peace. Reminds him that the Emperor has made many truces and treaties, none of which have been observed. 3099. GHINUCCI and LEE to [WOLSEY].

Letters came on the 30th April, stating that the Viceroy had taken a truce for eight months with the Pope. A place is left for the French and the Venetians. It is thought that the first post went to the French king. The Nuncio and the Venetians here are surprised they have not heard of it, and imagine that Francis is dissatisfied and retains the post, although the Pope had promised that he should join it. Some say Bourbon is not contented, and is gone to the land of the Venetians, and to content him the Pope sent him 60,000 ducats. It is thought there are secret articles for him and all the Pope's affairs with the Emperor. The Pope has promised for the Emperor's army 150,000 ducats, the Florentines 200,000. The advance of Bourbon made the Viceroy more quick to accept the truce, "ne admitteretur in participatum gloria." The Emperor has sent 200,000 ducats into Italy. The Empress expects her time in fourteen days. Wrote by Bluenantle that the Emperor said he stood under appellationem ad futurum concilium. The appellation is now printed. Wrote last on the 17 April. Lee has since written twice, but there is little to report even now. What there is Wolsey will learn by their joint letters. Some think the truce will not take effect, as Bourbon will not agree to it; others that it will be only between the Pope and the Emperor, not between the Emperor and France and the Venetians; for which reason the Emperor is about to raise 120,000 ducats for Italy. He is treating with the merchants. Hears that the Emperor has ordered the building of twenty galleys to be completed, of which the Genoese will pay half the cost. They say Bourbon's soldiers will not hear of the truce, as they hope to plunder Florence. The Pope is sending hither the Datary. Valladolid, 7 May 1527.

The Emperor has told the Nuncio that the French have detained two couriers sent hither by his Holiness, and have intercepted letters of the Legate, which, though they cannot decipher, they will not give up to him.

3105. PRINCESS MARY AND FRANCIS I.

"Relation de ce qui fut negocié en l'an 1525 (1527) avec Henry VIII. le Roy d'Angleterre et le Card. d'Yorck par l'evesque de Tarbes, le vicomte de Turenne et le president le Viste, ambassadeurs du roy François Premier, touchant le mariage de la fille dudit Roy d'Angleterre avec ledit Roy François, et pour traiter une alliance contre l'empereur Charles V. pour delivrance des enfans de France. Rédigé par écrit par Claude Dodieu, conseiller en la cour de Parlement de Paris."

On Feb. 26, 1525,* Messire Gabriel de Grammont, bishop of Tarbe, François vicomte de Turenne, Antoine le Viste, president of Paris and Bretagne, and the writer, embarked at Boulogne, arriving at Dover (Donuoes) at 1 p.m. Were met by Jean Joachim de Passaut, seigneur de Vaux, and proceeded to London. On Saturday, the 2nd of March, de Vaux went to the Cardinal, who asked him what charge they had as to Fitzwilliam's offers. De Vaux excused himself, and said only that it depended on Wolsey whether they took effect.—March 3. The ambassadors, with Dodieu as secretary, had audience of Wolsey at Westminster. The Bishop thanked him in Latin, on the part of Francis, for being the occasion of peace with the king of England, which peace had been the means of his deliverance ; and for proposing the marriage with the English princess. Wolsey answered he had not merited such honor ; and after reading the letters of credence presented by the Bishop, went with them into a little room, where the Bishop in French thanked Wolsey for his offers of the marriage, and of a closer league for the deliverance of the Princess, which the Emperor's anger at the marriage would make more difficult, and said they had brought powers to conclude these articles, and to treat for a universal peace ; and they were instructed to apply first to Wolsey, and to take his advice. One article they advisably omitted, to ask Wolsey to moderate the demands made by Fitzwilliam.

Wolsey thanked them for attributing the King's deliverance to him, and said that after seeing him at Ardre, he had become his servant in consequence of his nobleness and virtues, and no subsequent circumstances had destroyed his affection, which was increased by the similarity of the two Kings in habit and person ; he had endeavored to obtain his release, and to preserve his realm in his absence, and to dissuade Henry from invading it. As to Fitzwilliam's proceedings, Wolsey denied that he had any instructions to offer the Princess in marriage, and could not have taken it upon him to offer such a noble lady, but it had been talked of in France with his knowledge, and by the advice of Madame ; he added certain words in the Princess's praise, that she ought to be asked, not offered ; he had desired, and would desire, the restitution of the Princess, and for that reason had offered an offensive league in consideration of the marriage, but before either, he intended to confirm perpetual peace, that there might be no further contention between them ; of this Fitzwilliam and the bishop of Bath had made overtures in France. Answered that there was sure friendship, and that since the last treaty of peace with Madame, no one had doubted it would be perpetual. But Wolsey replied that this treaty was only during the lives of the two Kings, and they could not persuade him of the contrary, although the president of the Parliament assured him that it spoke of the King and his successors. He said nothing could be done without this, and the Princess could not be given to a man with whom they were not sure of perpetual friendship; he had told the French king of this, and he had said he would send ambassadors with full instructions. They answered they had no instructions on this point, and it was quite new to them. How can this be? said the Cardinal; Brinon and Robertet have been commissioned by Francis to hear the proposals made for perpetual peace by Madame's advice, and since Morette's departure I have sent them to France by Fitzwilliam, who has been answered by Francis that since the principal is granted, she has granted the three accessory demands about Boulogne, Ardre, the salt and the 50,000 cr. Answered that they thought the Cardinal was satisfied as to them, by the answer given by Fitzwilliam about their unreasonableness, and that Francis could not grant them without dishonor; he ought not to buy a wife so dear, when the marriage was so profitable to both parties. Wolsey answered that he regarded the honor of Francis as much as his master's, but he knew for certain that Henry could not consent to leave the Emperor without the perpetual peace and pension and the salt, and he had considered how to draw up the obligations so as to preserve the honor of France.

Madame
Eleanor.

He then asked about Francis's capability to marry, for he knew that he had espoused Madame Helienor per verba de presenti, that he had called her his wife in letters and in an apology in his own name, and that he had sent the secretary Bayard with articles signed by himself to demand her. Answered that the King made great protestations against the validity of the said marriage with Madame Helienor, which would be shown to the Cardinal, if necessary; that the King was but little bound by the treaty, as he was then in the Emperor's power; that he had refused to confirm it after returning home; that the Emperor bound himself to deliver Madame when he received the Princes, which he has not done, and has therefore broken the treaty. Wolsey was content with this;—repeated that the perpetual peace must be the foundation of the treaty, and that the Pope must give a judgment to take away all suspicion of the Spanish marriage. He meant to deal with them openly, and said nothing could be done without the salt and the 50,000 cr.; that he could not believe they had no instructions about it. Offered to show him all their instructions; which he declined, and said they ought not to dissemble, lest the Pope, hearing that the marriage makes no progress, should abandon them; for the Emperor, who is raising money in Flanders, under the pretence of a crusade, would meanwhile invade Italy, and the French king would be abandoned by all, and in greater danger than ever, especially as the Emperor offers to pay the pension owed by France, and to give one of the Princes as hostage with certain frontier towns in Flanders. Answered, that Francis would be very glad for his children to be in the hands of the King, but as to the Emperor's offers, the King had found out how much security was to be placed in him, and would not be likely to listen to them. Wolsey repeated that the marriage must be pressed on as the thing most likely to promote their interests. Answered, they had brought sufficient powers for that, and hoped that he would find the conditions reasonable. Wolsey again said that the marriage could not be settled without the perpetual peace and other demands, that he would tell the King of their coming, and on Thursday next they should see him.

Said that no such great demands were made when the Dauphin was proposed for her, though he might not be king for a long time. Wolsey replied angrily that that treaty was made when they were under age, to preserve the friendship of the kingdoms, but it was never intended to carry it out, and it could not be done without these demands. He then took the bishop of Tarbe aside, and told him of the trouble he had had to bring the King to consent to this, and of the opposition shown by some persons, and he said the same to the Viscount. He then recalled them, and said he would arrange that we should declare our credence to the King, and would ask him to commission persons to deliberate about it, that he did not doubt all would be entrusted to himself, and that on Friday they might begin to work. He then dismissed them, keeping Jean Joachim, and told him of the trouble he had had about the marriage, and that it was in danger of being broken off by this delay. Joachim answered that the delay was on his side, that he had always told him that this design of making France tributary would never be executed, but notwithstanding he had sent Fitzwilliam; that he was quite sure the ambassadors had no instructions about the perpetual peace, and if Francis knew how he had behaved about it, and in doubting his capacity, he would be very much displeased. Finally, he begged Joachim to prevent the ambassadors from writing anything to the King that might make him angry. On his return, Joachim told the ambassadors how necessary this marriage was to the English. They determined to persist in their refusal, as their instructions contained nothing except to ask the Cardinal to moderate the demands made by Fitzwilliam.

On Monday the 4th the Cardinal sent word that he wished to see them next day at 9 o'clock, which was Shrove Tuesday. He then told them that the day before he had told the King of their coming, and their powers for concluding the marriage, the offensive league, and the perpetual peace, at which the King was much pleased, and asked for the conditions of the peace, and was much surprised when Wolsey told him they had no charge about it; and he went on to use the same persuasions that he had on the previous Sunday about the salt and pension. Begged him to excuse them, as there was no mention of it in their instructions. Wolsey would not believe this, and said they must have other instructions, as Fitzwilliam had reported that Francis had consented to what he asked, and Clerk had written the same from France, and Francis's letters which he showed them gave credence to Fitzwilliam; he wished that Fitzwilliam would report to them what he had said to Francis about the salt and pension; that it was no use to send ambassadors unless he would grant them, and that Francis had replied that he was content with the marriage, and the ambassadors should settle the demands by Wolsey's advice; perpetual peace was more advantageous to France than England, and the pension was very little for deserting their old ally in favor of their old enemy, and the war expenses they would be led into would be far more than this; he would rather pay it himself to the French king than that the alliance should fail, always repeating these words, Sine hoc nihil fiet, and they on their side always assuring him that the King could never consent. Finally, he said he could not believe that Francis had given up his intention of treating with the Emperor and marrying dame Eleanor; suspected that he had sent them thus unprovided to facilitate treating with Spain; and said that if he would let him know such to be his intention, he would willingly assist to bring it about.

On their return consulted on their future course, as their instructions only authorized them to ask the Cardinal to moderate the demands, and decided to write to the King that they hoped to make the Cardinal abate a little, and to ask him to write a letter to the king of England according to a minute drawn up by Jean Joachim, and sent to monseigneur d'Alluye (?) asking him not to insist on what is so dishonorable and grievous, and similar letters to Wolsey.

On Thursday the 7th, went to Greenwich, "distant de Londres 3000" (trois milles). Were presented to the King in his arriere salle. The bishop of Tarbo presented him the letters of credence from Francis and his mother, which he called Wolsey to read. Thirteen or fourteen other persons were present, including the bishops of London and Ely, the dukes of Montfort (Norfolk) and Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, Talabor, grand master of England (Talbot earl of Shrewsbury), Feuguillain, Mon. de Rochefort, Mr. Mauro (Sir Thos. More), his secretary, the dean of Windsor (Sampson), and others. The bishop declared as his credence the first and second articles of the first instructions. The King replied that he was much obliged to Francis for condescending to take his little daughter, who did not deserve such honor; he had for a long time had an affection for the King, such as a simple gentleman might have for his friend, and, if their state allowed, he would not be one single day without his company; their alliance was so firm that there was no necessity to make a fresh treaty; that in consequence of the marriage he hoped they would achieve what would be to the glory of God and the exaltation of all Christendom. Afterwards he said he was astonished that nothing was said in the credence about the universal peace, but he had been informed that they had orders to treat of it. Answered, that they were commissioned to do so after the marriage, for which chiefly they were sent. He said, you forget the perpetual peace and the conditions required. Answered, that the peace between the kingdoms was so firm that it would last for ever, and it could not be more ample. He answered that it was for their lives. To their argument that the good effects of the peace would induce their successors to maintain it, and that the knowledge of its utility was the true way to preserve it, he said that the chief cause of its commencement was the friendship of the kings, but that their successors might have a different opinion; their friendship made him desirous of removing all causes of war from their successors. The ambassadors excused themselves for want of power. Henry said this could not be, and showed Madame's letter, expressing a hope of perpetual peace. Told him that was not the meaning of it; that they had no instructions on that point, as it was considered a thing already done; that they had informed their master of the Cardinal's instances, and they asked Henry that commissioners might be appointed to settle the conditions of the marriage with them. He agreed to this, but wished to know the truth about Madame Helyenor, for he could not give his heiress to a man about whose capacity to marry there might be doubts. Reminded him of Fitzwilliam's interview with the King on the subject; that he had been forced to promise what he did not think himself bound to perform; that Fitzwilliam had spoken about the Princess as from the king of England, and that in consequence of that, they were sent; Francis would never do anything contrary to honor or his conscience, and they feared he would think it strange that this difficulty should be made after he had given his word. The King said nothing was intended but to discover if the French king was able to contract the marriage. Would say no more about it, as they were not instructed to dispute about his capacity. The King recalled his councillors, and, after consulting with them, said that Francis did him great honor in demanding his daughter, and he would give her, if Francis was a mere gentleman, but all advised him not to risk her being afterwards separated, and his capability of contracting marriage must be declared. Promised to inform Francis. Wolsey then with great courtesy told them that the next day was fixed for the commencement of the business, and asked them to come to his house in the afternoon to meet the English commissioners. Answered, that if a declaration of the King's capacity was necessary, it was only waste of time; they would write to him, and could say nothing till they had his answer. Wolsey said they had better come and hear what they had to say; which they agreed to do. The King took Turenne aside, and told him that such great matters could not be treated without difficulties. Turenne said these should be graciously handled, and advised him not to require anything dishonorable from Francis.

Council.

On the 8th, met Norfolk, Suffolk, the bishops of London and Ely, lord Rochford, Fitzwilliam, and Mr. More, at the Cardinal's house. Wolsey thanked Francis for the offer of marriage, but finished by saying that the engagement to Madame Helyenor must be cleared up. Answered as before, and said they had informed their master, but they expected he would think it strange. The Cardinal and the others excused themselves; said they did not consider he was bound by his promise; they did not wish to irritate him, but wished to have everything settled honorably to both parties; future disputes about the marriage might lead to trouble; they desired the reasons for which Francis is free to marry, and a papal declaration thereon, to be placed in the archives of France and England. The English commissioners then declared in French, that they wished for the conclusion of the marriage, and they only desired matters to be so firmly settled that they might not be hereafter broken. Thanked them; promised to write to Francis, but declined to dispute about his capacity till they heard from him. At Wolsey's request, showed him their powers for treating of the marriage. He found fault that they were not empowered to swear for Francis and bind him under censures and obligations. Promised to obtain such a power; and the Cardinal said they were content to commence the capitulation about the marriage, told him that, in consequence of what Clerk and Fitzwilliam had said, they had been sent to ask for the Princess. He answered that the King had consented to it, and they all thought that the conditions would be considered so reasonable, that matters would be soon settled; he then told them that the Imperial ambassador had been with him that morning, having heard of the proposed alliance, and was more mild than usual. Knew he came then by Wolsey's orders, but said nothing. He went on to talk about the need of a universal peace against the Turks; said that the Ambassador told him he had power to treat for peace with Francis, and to give up his children on such conditions as the king of England thinks reasonable; that the Ambassador had had the power for a long time, but Wolsey had advised him not to produce it till they came, and now he would give it to Wolsey, and a copy to the French ambassadors. Answered that they had ample powers for a universal peace, which they would show before the ambassadors of the Pope and Venice, but not without them,—that they did not intend to treat with the Emperor till the marriage was concluded, and that Francis would remit his differences with the Emperor to Henry. Wolsey said that Clerk had told Francis it would be better to begin by concluding the universal peace; to which he answered, that though he had told his ambassadors to begin with the marriage, he would follow Wolsey's advice; which was to take the peace first, as the Emperor was well disposed. Excused their refusal by their instructions, and said besides, if the peace were made, the Emperor might stipulate for Francis marrying his sister. He answered that the Emperor might consent to the marriage and give his sister to Charles de Bourbon. Answered that their commission did not require the consent of the Emperor or his sister, and that the King would not suffer Bourbon's affair to be connected with his.

The ambassadors at last show their powers.

Next day brought their powers for the universal peace, and the papal and Venetian ambassadors did the same by Wolsey's orders, that they might be read over without beginning to capitulate, and in the absence of the imperial ambassador. This done, Wolsey talked for a long time with the bishop of Tarbe, making him great offers, and saying that the conditions of the marriage would be easy, as the King had no male heirs, and that he would look at the previous treaties of marriage, and follow the most sumptuous. The Bishop said the King meant to take her over to France; but Wolsey said that could not be, on account of her age. The Bishop said that all the virtues and graces he had spoken of could not exist in a person unfit for marriage, and they would supply the deficiency of age, and that the greatest difficulty was the salt and the pension, about which there was nothing definite in their instructions. On the following Monday, the 11th, Rochford invited Tarbe and Turenne to visit the King the next day, while waiting for their answer from France. The President and Jean Joachim visited Wolsey on Tuesday. The Bishop and Turenne were conducted to Greenwich by the bishop of London and Rochford. After dinner the King sent for them to the Queen's chamber, and they talked about the King's prosperity and the friendship of the two monarchs. The Queen asked the Bishop if they did not intend to treat for a universal peace. He answered that the object for which they had come must precede, but did not state what it was, as he did not know whether it ought to be mentioned to the Queen; but the King said, smiling, to her, that he was speaking of the marriage of the Princess. They then begged for her favor for the marriage; which she promised, but said that what concerns only two princes should not delay the profit of all Christendom. Suggested that after the marriage, Henry, being Francis's father-in-law, could moderate the disputes which would arise on the articles of the peace, so as to tend to the honor and content of all parties. To the Queen's objection that this alliance would make the King suspected by the Emperor, told her that the two Kings would be so powerful that they could dictate terms to the Emperor.

Went to see the furniture and riches of the King, who ordered a suit of armour to be made for Turenne, like his own, which are said to be the safest and the easiest that are made. When Turenne was speaking to the King of the high regard Francis had for him, and that he was the means of his deliverance, he told Turenne of the close alliance that he had had with the Emperor before the King's capture; that he had prepared 6,000 horse and 30,000 foot to invade France when the King was taken prisoner; he then sent word to the Emperor of his preparations, and told him to do the like, according to their alliance; to which the Emperor answered, that he had the French king in his power, and that his captivity seemed a better means for obtaining their ends than going to war; that from this time he lost his wish of attacking Francis, and exhorted the Emperor to treat him well and set him free graciously; made a defensive alliance with Madame, and thus ensured the tranquillity of the kingdom in the King's absence. He thought Francis ought to be much pleased with the devotion and obedience of his people, who never favored Bourbon, much as he had been esteemed in France, and he considered him very happy to reign among such people. Le Viste, Jean Joachim, and Dodieu were all the afternoon at Westminster with Wolsey, who tried to treat about the salt and the 50,000 cr., saying that the peace made with the Regent was only for the lives of the kings; that it was not authorized by the Estates of England, without whose consent such contracts were never considered stable or binding on successors; that in order to make them accept it, some profit must be shown to accrue from it, as England will be bound not to trouble France, even in those lands to which a claim is asserted, and he could not think of anything less than the salt and pension; he recited the articles for the succession of children from the marriage, and for the first son to be brought up in England, &c., like enough to their instructions; that in an affair of such importance the Estates of both kingdoms must consent; and he endeavored to make them say something about the demands, but they merely replied that they were waiting to hear from Francis, but would discuss the marriage. Wolsey, however, returned to the demands and the custom of assembling the Estates. In answer to the President's question about their manner and powers, he answered that they were summoned by the King, and deliberated on matters proposed by him, the result of which was always in accordance with the King's desire, and that their decisions were inviolable. Thought that this consent of the Estates was put forward for some purpose, as they discovered afterwards; and the President insisted that it could not be so, as the law of succession was fixed in France and England; there was no necessity for this in France; the King, who is the soul of the law, could make what law he chose for the good of the kingdom, and being registered in the Court of Parliament it was rigidly enforced. Wolsey then spoke about the capacity of Francis to marry, called his doctor to read reasons which he had drawn up in favor of it, founded on the non-consummation and the compulsion by imprisonment;

all the doubt was owing to Francis having demanded her by his ambassador after his return. Answered that they had not heard of that, and, from what Francis had said, thought it was not true; that the captivity of his children caused him as much fear as his own, and would excuse what he had said. The next day, the 13th, Wolsey invited them to dine with him the following Friday.

At 7 o'clock on Friday morning seigneur D'Ouarty, Grand Maistro Reformateur des Eaux et Forêts de France, arrived with two instructions; the first approving of what the ambassadors had done as to the demands, which the Council thought unreasonable, and would not grant, even if they could not succeed in their charge otherwise. But, contrary to the advice of his Council, and for the love he bears to the King and the Princess, he will deliver to the King during his and the Queen's lives 1,500 cr. worth of salt every year, which shall be delivered "au Brouage" at the current price to the King's deputies. He demands the delivery of the Princess within a month after the ratification, otherwise he will not listen to the marriage; the offensive league must commence at the consummation of the marriage, and last until the delivery of the Princess; the universal peace must be taken after the marriage and offensive league; they must manage matters with moderation so as not to produce a rupture. The second instructions were, that if the English deputies persisted in these demands, the King would grant them as follows: that any child, male or female, who came to the English crown, should have for his appanage from France 1,500 cr. worth of salt, and 50,000 cr. yearly to him and his successors. And it was suggested in the agreement to insert the words "la fortune de France distraite." As to the King's obligation to Madame Eleanor, the same answer as before was given, and that a declaration from Rome could be had, though it was not necessary. Finally they contained instances of the Emperor's ingratitude to Henry, and of the opportunity offered in Italy to diminish his strength, orders to hurry on the marriage and the delivery of the Princess, as delay will produce suspicions, and the Emperor will spare nothing to prevent it, and any mischance in Italy might hinder it. D'Ouarty also brought a letter in cipher, unsigned, that if the ambassadors see that a refusal of the demands will produce a rupture, they must yield, and take pains to find out whether the object of the demands is to delay the delivery of the Princess and the offensive league.

Went to Wolsey, and found him in the gallery with the English deputies. D'Ouarty gave him the King's letters from the draft sent by Joachim, and begged him to give up the demands, and advise Henry to do so, as they were dishonorable and impossible. This seemed strange to Wolsey, to judge from his face, and he asked them if they had anything else to say. They said they had not; that that was their answer from the King. He said they either did not understand their commission, or intended to manage it differently to their orders; for Clerk had written that the King told him they had power to grant the demands, which letter he translated to them in Latin. Referred to D'Ouarty and the King's letters to the Cardinal, and assured him that was all the answer. Dined with him, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Rochford, the bishops of London and Ely. After dinner, Wolsey repeated that from his desire to serve the French king he had advised the marriage and the alliance for actual war against the Emperor, contrary to the opinion of many of the Council; that the demands were so small that he would never have thought Francis would have made so much difficulty; as to his praying the king of England not to force him to do what will make him hated by his people, he ought, on the other hand, to regard the honor and satisfaction of the King and people of England, who will never grant a perpetual peace without some recompence for their claims; and though he is better disposed to Francis than to any one else beside the King, he would rather die than give such advice, for which he would be thought either a fool or a traitor, and would be in danger of being murdered in his house: Francis should consider his services, and not press him to do what might cause his death.

To these words, spoken with an angry countenance, they replied calmly and gently, telling him the gratitude Francis felt to him, and his desire for his safety, and the increase of his power, in consequence of his favor to French affairs; and he begged him to dissuade the king of England from making such a demand, which is neither honorable nor reasonable; his Council determined that it could not be granted, but, from his affection to the King and the Princess, he will pay 15,000* cr. of salt annually during the life of the King and Queen, which is making his kingdom tributary. Wolsey took no more account of this than if they had given him a pair of gloves; said he would abate nothing; that the King had granted it to Clerk; that they did not understand matters, and would spoil everything; that he was displeased at their not taking his advice; that if he knew any other way he would help them to it willingly, but that to decide on the perpetual peace, which is the foundation of everything else, the Estates must be summoned, and they would never consent to the Princess's marriage without taking away all occasions of future war, which cannot be done without this recompence. Understood by this for what reason Wolsey had invented his three Estates. It was finally settled that next day D'Ouarty should present his letters to the King.

Consulted on their return as to what they should do. Were much troubled by Clerk's letter, and saw it would be difficult to defend themselves. Next day, the 16th, D'Ouarty and Jean Joachim being ready to go to Greenwich, Mons. Chesnay (Cheney), gentleman of the Chamber, came to conduct D'Ouarty, and said the King expected him alone. After reading his letter, the King said he knew that he came about the demands; that as to the salt, it was only 15,000 cr., he had often lost more than that at play; as to the pension of 50,000 cr., which he finds so odious, he should think also of Henry's honor, and that he cannot give up his claims on France without contenting his people, especially as he is giving up his only daughter. D'Ouarty answered that Francis did not ask for her because she was an heiress; if Henry had a dozen daughters he would ask for one, from his affection and gratitude to the King, which he will never forget, as the Emperor had done. Henry seemed pleased, put his hands on D'Ouarty's shoulders, and told him commissioners were appointed to treat with them; that he would tell Wolsey to be reasonable, and they must be also. The King then led him to the Queen's chamber. Gave her messages from Madame and the queen of Navarre, but said nothing about his charge, as Wolsey had told him not to do so. Wrote on the 16th to their master an account of these conferences.

Next Monday, the 18th, D'Ouarty and Joachim visited Wolsey, who received them coldly. He told them he heard from the Venetian ambassador that the Pope was in treaty with the viceroy of Naples for a year's abstinence from war, which was delayed till England and Venice had decided about joining it; the proposed marriage was the best remedy to keep the Pope from doing this. The Papal and Venetian ambassadors then entered by Wolsey's direction.

He repeated what he had said, adding that Henry, to gratify Francis, had aided the Pope and the Holy League, and was ready still to help his Holiness with money, and keep him from the alliance with the Emperor, if his Holiness, the French king and the Signory would bind themselves not to make any agreement with the Emperor without Henry's consent. They thanked him, but declined answering without their colleagues, and asked when he would please to treat about the marriage according to the king of England's desire. He replied that the King was determined to have the two demands; that he knew that the difficulty made by Francis came from his desire to marry Madame Helyenor, but the alliance could be made by the marriage of the Princess with the Dauphin, or of the duke of Richmond with the French princess. This was a new proposal. Answered that this was not the way the king of England meant the marriage to be treated; nor was it according to his own promise at Greenwich, that he would do what was agreeable to the French king. He answered that he had told them the way it could be done. Till now the ambassadors hoped they would gain something, but on hearing this report they were in great perplexity. Clerk's letters and the news from Italy were the causes of their failure. After long discussion, determined to offer, at the next meeting, to treat in detail of the demands and the conditions of marriage, according to D'Ouarty's second instructions, and to find out their intention as to the speedy delivery of the Princess.

On the 19th met the deputies, except Suffolk, at Wolsey's house at 9 a.m. Wolsey did not receive them with his usual countenance. He asked Tarbe and Turenne if they were well lodged; said that, if not, he would find them another house nearer his own. Said they were satisfied, and asked him to consult about their matter, as the King wished. He said he was ready, but they must begin with the foundation, the perpetual peace. Told him that the peace, the marriage, and the offensive league should be treated together; it was not reasonable for them to negotiate about the demands, without knowing what would be agreed about the marriage and the league; his suggestion, that paying the pension to the King and his successors was only paying it to themselves, is not true, for the King and Queen are young enough to have male children, in which case it would not be reasonable for these conditions to be observed. He replied that the payments might be declared to be for future kings of England, the issue of the Princess. He said that the difficulties on their side were no less, and that the perpetual peace could not be had without these demands. Answered that if they were to make these promises, they would be void as indiscreet and causeless; if they were made for the marriage, it would be selling the Sacraments of the Church; if for the peace, there is perpetual peace already. This last assertion he would not allow, and referred to Joachim, who had been present at the meeting for the last treaty. He answered nothing then, but told them afterwards that Wolsey was right. Said that the manner of the demands was dishonorable and impossible, but if Wolsey would treat about the marriage and the league, and show himself reasonable, they hoped to find means to grant a portion. As he was determined to listen to nothing before the peace, assured him that he would have what would please him, and began to tell him some of the articles about the Princess's dower and the succession. Wolsey seemed easy about this, but wished first to know what they meant about satisfying him as to the demands. Wished first to be assured of the prompt delivery of the Princess, and the offensive league; but proposed that any child coming to the English throne should have for his appanage from France a certain sum for him and his successors. He thought nothing of this; and said that the portion, which would be in lieu of the right of succession of their children, would not recompense them for their claims in France; and, finally, that the perpetual peace is the commencement, and, that despatched, the rest could be settled in an hour.

He would say nothing about the delivery of the Princess, except that he would act so as to satisfy Francis; but, when pressed, said she should be delivered when she was of marriageable age. Referred to Clerk's and Fitzwilliam's offer, but he said she could not be delivered till she should be of marriageable age in the opinion of the queen of England and Madame. As to the offensive league, he said that it should be discussed with the peace and the marriage, and signed at the same time; ambassadors should then be sent by both Kings to summon the Emperor to accept honorable conditions, or war on refusal. Made him repeat this, and took their leave. Tarbe, D'Ouarty, and Joachim returned to ask Wolsey if, granting the salt and pension, Fitzwilliam's offer of the prompt delivery of the Princess would be carried out. He answered that he would not advise her delivery till of age, for half the realm of France, and he refused to give hostages, but their promise might be trusted. Tarbe said, in presence of Norfolk, "When you would not observe the marriage with the Dauphin, and told us it was never your intention to keep it." He denied that he had spoken of it, but had said that the marriage should be ratified by such princes and estates of England as ought to satisfy them, and advised them not to break off what might be so useful to their master; their objections must arise from the King's wishing to marry Madame Helyenor; if the King would say so, he would make the marriage with the duke of Orleans, or the French princess with the duke of Richmond. D'Ouarty said Francis had broken off the marriage by advice of the King and Wolsey, and such proposal should be let alone. Would have granted the demands immediately, if Wolsey had granted the delivery. Wrote to the King on the 20th.

On the 21st Joachim went again to Wolsey, reminded him of former interviews about the marriage, in which he promised the delivery of the Princess, in consequence of which the ambassadors had come, and that he had made fresh difficulties at every conference with them. He said the King could choose whether to marry the Princess or let d'Orleans have her. Answered that the King wished for her; that this proposal about d'Orleans was merely to put off her delivery, which had before been granted. Wolsey replied that Fitzwilliam had no power to grant it, and begged Joachim to return with the others to talk more fully about the last proposal.

offers.

On the 22nd Tarbe and Joachim were all the morning with the Cardinal, who finally proposed an alternative marriage; that if Francis refuses the Princess, the duke of Orleans shall marry her, and shall be brought up in England with her; the King shall not promise her to any other, unless, when the Duke comes of age, he refuses to marry her; the two Kings shall endeavour by peaceable ways to recover the Princess, and, if their conditions are not accepted by the Emperor in a certain time, shall make war on him; perpetual peace shall be taken between the two Kings and their successors, with payment of the salt and 50,000 cr. annually by France, to be observed if the marriage take place, and the English make war on the Emperor; if the marriage do not take place, Francis shall reimburse Henry for the expenses of the war, and shall pay the salt during Henry's lifetime; or the peace shall be maintained with paying the war costs, according to the choice of the French king; if Henry refuse to deliver the Princess when of age, he shall not be reimbursed for the war, and the perpetual peace shall not hold good; all conquests shall be divided; the Kings shall be bound not to make separate terms with the Emperor, and a universal peace shall be treated for at the proper time through Henry.

These articles Wolsey told them to communicate to the French king, and he would do the like to Henry.

Wolsey also offered to visit Francis on this matter at the end of May. Received letters from Francis, that he had heard from Venice that the Viceroy, being unsuccessful against the Pope, was endeavoring to obtain an abstinence. He disapproved of this after the successes of the army at Freszelonne, and the reduction of the city, and would not accept it; he had heard that Russell, ambassador with the Pope, had returned to Rome with Caesar Feramosque, and thence to Venice, to persuade the Signory to accept the abstinence, which is contrary to the present negotiations; and he wishes them to remonstrate with the King about it. To this Wolsey replied that Russell would do no such thing. He went the next day to Hampton Court, where the King was. The Princess also had lately come thither.

next day, went to the Palace, a handsome house, built by Wolsey, and presented by him to the King. Wolsey asked Tarbe if they had considered the articles; to which he answered that they had sent them to Francis, but refused to give any opinion on them, except that Francis would not think much of them, as he refused the immediate delivery of the Princess. This cold speech did not please Wolsey, who said that the delivery was impossible, and he could not make a treaty more profitable to Francis than the said articles. Henry approved of them, and the consent of Francis alone was now wanted, and he asked the ambassadors to tell him so. After the King had heard mass, Wolsey led them to him in the hall. The King told them he had sent for them to stay with him while they were waiting for their letters. Dined with Wolsey, Norfolk, Suffolk, and the marquis of Exeter. After dinner, went with Wolsey to the Queen's chamber, where the King was also. The Queen and Wolsey conversed with the Bishop, and the King with Turnine and Le Viste about the Lutheran heresy and his book, showing himself to be very learned. Taking leave of the Queen, the King talked with them for some time, and then Wolsey led them to his room with Norfolk, Suffolk, Rochford, and Fitzwilliam. Before entering, he told Tarbe that to conceal from the other English deputies that nothing new had been done, and to hide from them the occasion of our truce, he wished to treat now of the universal peace. He spoke of the cruelties of the Turk, and exhorted them to come to a universal peace for the purpose of a crusade. Tarbe answered, he thought they had already satisfied Wolsey about that, and asked permission to consult with his colleagues. They then produced the last article of the first instructions brought by D'Ouarty, that they must first treat of the marriage and the offensive league. He remonstrated with them, but to no purpose; he wished them to understand that he had drawn up the articles, to satisfy Francis; asked them to tell Francis of Henry's wish; said it should be concluded immediately on hearing that Francis accepts; that haste was necessary, that there might be more time to fight the Emperor; that for the security of these articles there was no need to assemble the Estates, or observe great solemnity; ambassadors should be immediately sent to the Emperor to demand an answer in 20 days; if this were negatived, Henry would meet the King at Boulogne or elsewhere a fortnight before Pentecost; that then the alternative marriage should be decided; Francis should be satisfied as to the offensive league and the delivery of the Princess; that to hasten matters, the offers to be made to the Emperor about the liberation of the Princes should be agreed on; that he would promote French interests with as much affection as if they were his King's. Returned to their lodging in the village. Norfolk, Suffolk, and Exeter, who supped with them, told them of the King's answer to the Archduke's ambassador, who asked for aid against the Turks, that the strength of the Emperor, the Archduke, and England is not sufficient, but that he will assist if they make peace with France.

Returned to London the next day, March 30. Sent an express with an account of everything to the king (Francis), asking him to communicate his final intention to Clerk. Wrote also to Madame; told her of Wolsey's affection for her, that he had ordered daily prayers to be offered for her in his college at Oxford. Wrote to Robertet, asking him to bestow on Wolsey's bastard son, whom he calls his nephew, and who is studying at Paris, a house belonging to St. John Lateran. 4 April, received two letters from the King, dated 27 March. The first letter said, that he had heard from Clerk that Wolsey could not content the ambassadors, as they would not declare the King's wish as to the demands, and he expected the King had some other purpose. He wished them to tell Wolsey that they had orders to treat about the demands, if he would treat at the same time about the marriage and delivery of the Princess, and the offensive league, and to ask Wolsey to be reasonable; their powers were so ample that nothing should be delayed for want of it; they must speak openly to Wolsey, and not let him get suspicious. In the second letter, the King said he had re-read their articles and letters of the 22nd, and would show them to Madame. On April 4, received other letters from the King, dated 31 March, enclosing the powers asked for, and instructions about the articles; he hoped that they would conclude the treaties this time, and he asked Wolsey to persuade Henry to allow him to come to France, and to tell him the time; he would do for him what he would not do for all the cardinals in Rome,—would go to Picardy to meet him and talk privately with him; he said also that the Pope had concluded eight months' truce with the Emperor, which he and the Signory would not enter. The instructions were that he wished to marry the Princess, that articles for the dowry, &c., and for the salt and pension, should be made; that if she could not be delivered at once, the offensive league must begin at June 1, and last till the recovery of the Princess and the satisfaction of the king of England; the expence to be shared; he approves of the alternative marriage, but his wish is to marry her himself; if war is made, and the marriage not performed, he will pay expences, except as far as Henry has paid himself by conquests from the Emperor; the Princess's age must be inserted in the marriage treaty. There was added, in cipher, that if they cannot obtain the immediate delivery of the Princess they must conclude the articles as they are, but must be careful to do nothing disagreeable to their master. Three powers were also sent, dated March 31; the first for treating of the marriage, the peace, and the league; the second to Turenne to be the King's proxy to marry the Princess par paroles de futur; the third to conclude the foresaid articles.

The same day Joachim informed Wolsey that the King had written. He answered he heard from Clerk that the King approved of the articles, and had sent power to grant them. The other ambassadors went to him after dinner, showed him the King's first letters, the agreement with Venice to persevere in the Holy League, of which Wolsey had already heard, as well as of the suspension of arms granted by the Pope. He said much about the means of making the alliance and the marriage; that the conditions of the latter would depend on whether it were the King or the duke of Orleans; that ambassadors must be sent to offer a ransom for the Princes, which he estimated at two millions; if the Emperor will not take a ransom without the marriage of his sister, both the King and Cardinal advise it to be carried out rather than break off the affair, deducting the 2,000,000, which would be a suitable sum for her dowry. Answered, that this about Madame Helyenor was contrary to their charge. He replied that their charge was to treat of the offensive league, which could not take place till the Emperor had refused the conditions offered, or insisted on the marriage with Madame Helyenor; that rather than fail of a universal peace, Francis had better marry her, and this should be treated of. Answered, that for that marriage the aid of the King and Wolsey was not necessary; that the King had no wish for it after the advice of Wolsey, the Pope, and the Signory. Read and discussed the articles in Latin. As to the condition that if neither marriage take place, the French king may choose either perpetual peace or payment of war expences, Wolsey said he must declare what he will do before the war commences.

Next day returned to Westminster, and met Wolsey and the deputies. Demanded the prompt delivery of the Princess, the execution of the offensive league, and the renunciation of claims on France, and showed the powers sent them.

He made a difficulty about the delivery, whatever security they promised. Offered to treat of the alternative marriage, and showed their power. After consulting with his colleagues, he asked the French to choose between the certain and the alternative marriage. They chose the former, for the King. He spoke again of the difficulty about delivering her, and said that was his reason for proposing the alternative; that Henry approved of the articles, but they were drawn up roughly, and would want modifying. Fearing that this would merely bring new difficulties, insisted on their conclusion as they stand, alleging the limitation of the power sent to them.

The principal contention was about the article should Henry refuse to deliver the Princess, which was drawn up in Wolsey's presence. He wished it to be struck out, and another to be inserted that if the King or Orleans refused the Princess twice, the expence of the war should be paid, to make the conditions equal. It was determined that if, after the declaration of Francis as to the marriage, which must be before the commencement of the war, the King prevents it, Francis shall not be bound to observe the peace or repay the costs. The declaration of Francis as to the marriage, the time of which was not specified in the articles, was settled to be made before the English declare war. Wolsey returned to what he had said about the marriage with Madame Helyenor, and the dukes of Orleans and Richmond. Made the same answer as before. Not contented with having so often spoken of Madame Helyenor, Wolsey told Tarbe that the King and his Council advised this marriage for the good of peace, if the Emperor would not restore the Princess without, and would not make war on the Emperor if Francis refused it. At this De Tarbe desired his fellows to bear witness to these words, and they took leave of him, ill-pleased, and "en contenance de rupture." Could not make out for certain Wolsey's intention, for he had prevented the marriage with Madame Helyenor as much as he could, but made these offers to discover what Francis wished. Always answered so as to extinguish his jealousy about her. While dining, Wolsey sent to say that he wished to see one or two of them privately. Tarbe and Joachim went. Wolsey agreed not to mention Madame Helyenor in the treaty; and to the article about Henry's refusing the marriage, it should be added, "after Francis's declaration about the alternative." This must be made at the interview between the Kings and the Cardinal before the commencement of war, which Henry will be bound to make, even if Francis refuse the marriage entirely; if Orleans marries the Princess, and she succeeds to the throne, the peace must be observed; the conditions to be offered to the Emperor shall be inserted in general terms in the treaty, and the particulars given to the ambassadors, signed by both Kings; war to be declared in twenty days; Francis to offer 2,000,000 and Hedin, on the Emperor returning Tournay, the sovereignty of Flanders to remain with the Emperor during his life, and Bourbon's revenues to be paid to him yearly. If the Emperor demand the marriage, and will deduct the 2,000,000 from the dowry, the ambassadors must inform their masters and wait for answer. Wolsey also promised an interview between the two Kings.

Wrote to the King, 7 April. On the 10th the treaties were drawn up and read before the Cardinal and the English and French commissioners;—the first of closer friendship, the second the offensive league, the third the perpetual peace. In the last, they wished an article to be inserted that Francis should not be bound by it, unless the war or the marriage take place. He would not consent to this. All they could gain was that a separate article should state that the treaties depended on each other. Copied the said treaties secretly at night, and discussed them in the morning. Proposed several modifications, and sent them to the King on the 12th, by "le Commandeur de l'An (Laon)," asking for his opinion, and that the bishop of Bath might not hear anything of it; but said nothing of the endeavors for the reformation of the treaty made by Tarbe, Joachim, and Le Viste, who went to Wolsey on the 11th, and showed him the said difficulties, some of which he granted, as much as possible to the King's profit, always advising them to finish their charge as soon as possible.

NARRATIVE.

On the 14th heard that Wolsey had gone to the King. On the 15th went to him again at Westminster. He said the King approved of the treaties, with many good words and promises, and, notwithstanding their excuses of the little leisure they had had to see the treaty, told them that if it was not settled by Wednesday it must be put off till the Thursday after Easter; he had added the number of men required for the war,—9,000 foot, 3,000 archers, 6,000 pikemen and hackbutmen, and 1,000 horse, with 500 men for the sea,—and he was sure Henry would be ready sooner than Francis. Promised matters should be settled on Wednesday, and signed on both sides, subject to the pleasure of the King. As their power which contained the first articles was not sufficient, Wolsey drew up a draft, which they sent to Francis. Heard from Italian merchants in London that Wolsey had ordered them to take their property away from Flanders and the Emperor's country, and not to trade there.

On the 16th Wolsey was taken ill with tertian fever. Went to his house next day. He excused himself from dining with them, leaving them with the deputies. After dinner he talked about the difficulties which they had sent to the King by the Commander de Laon, and most were altered as they wished. Tried to alter the articles about the twenty days to be given to the Emperor to answer, about the consent of the king of England being necessary to attempts for the delivery of the Princes, and about the 50,000 cr.; but in vain. The English referred to a similar pension granted by Louis XI. The salt in case of the marriage of the Dauphin was reduced to 1,500 cr. Sent particulars to the King. The treaties could not be signed, owing to the many erasures, and business was postponed till after Easter. After breaking up the meeting Wolsey talked with one and another. Learned that Suffolk will lead the army. He told Tarbe how desirous he was of serving the French king.

Francis.

On the 19th, Friday, the Commander de Laon arrived at 8 a.m., with letters of the 18th, saying that Francis found matters were very different to Clerk's and Fitzwilliam's offers, and to the first articles sent; he was satisfied with the renunciation of rights, the 50,000 cr., and the salt; the crowns to be of the weight and alloy now used in France; he will pay two thirds of the war expences; the time for making the summons must be fixed, that the war may begin on July 15; he approves of the treaty for closer friendship, if the choice of the marriage remains with him; if, after choosing, the marriage falls through by his fault, he will pay for the war; if by the King's fault, Francis will be bound to pay nothing; they must be careful about the article which forbids either to treat with the Emperor separately, as by that Henry might leave the Princes as hostages. This was altered so that no treaty could be made without the delivery of the Princes and the reimbursement of Henry; the article not to have effect before the marriage, or after the actual offensive league. The King intends to observe the treaty of Madrid, except as to Bourgogne, Auxonne, Masconnois, Auxerrois, and other adjacent lands, and to leave the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois to the Emperor during his life. He will not execute the article about the kingdom of Navarre, the duke of Gueldres, and Fornsees (?). As to the aids demanded by the Emperor in Italy and Germany, he wishes to have the King's and Wolsey's advice, as well as about Naples and Milan; he will pay 500,000 cr. three months after the treaty, at the delivery of the Dauphin, "autres cinq mils" (cinq cent mils) at the delivery of Orleans, and the rest by 100,000 cr. a year. The treaty of Madrid will be followed as to Bourbon. Nothing to be concluded but what these letters authorize.

Were much astonished, and afraid that their letters had not been understood; that they could not hope for any diminution, and Wolsey was pressing them to sign, and always saying that his master was continually urged to break it off by many of his Council, one of them being Norfolk, with whom Wolsey had had high words in the King's presence, which had partly caused his illness. Fearing delay might lead to serious consequences, despatched a courier to Francis post haste. The price of the crowns was fixed more advantageously for Francis, at 35 sols Tournois. If salt is scarce one year, less may be paid, and the quantity made up the next year. As to the renunciation, it cannot be made without delivering land; the English only intend to promise, not to trouble the King or his successors in his possessions. Wolsey says it means simply that as long as the French wish to have peace, they will pay the 50,000 cr.; when they please to make war they will be free from it. The terms of the offensive league are more exact. Immediately on the Emperor's refusal, the English will commence war. As to the King's choice of the alternative marriage, which was granted in the first articles, Wolsey said it was not right that such a lady should be at the King's refusal, and it was worded that Henry should marry her to Francis or the duke of Orleans as he thought best; but still Francis can refuse her for both without Henry's consent; in this case, if war is made, Francis must either accept the peace or pay the expences, which he will be freed from if the marriage is hindered by any one in England. If after the declaration it is hindered by Francis, he must pay double the war expences.

These particulars are remitted till the interview with Wolsey. The article against separate treating is to last till the return of the Princes and the satisfaction of the king of England. The terms to be offered to the Emperor were those before mentioned. Though matters were thus near enough to the King's wishes, put off the settlement until the arrival of the courier sent on the 19th. Wolsey's illness assisted them in doing this. Though still suffering from tertian fever, he sent for Joachim and Tarbe on the 22nd. He spoke of his services to Francis and Madame, and his endeavors to settle the treaty; said he had heard from Clerk that the King and Madame were ill pleased with the variations he had made from his previous offers. This was very unpleasant to him, and did him more harm than his illness. They could see that he was angry with them for having written thus to Francis. They excused themselves by their necessity of writing a full account to their master. Wolsey spoke of a difficulty that had before been made about the summoning and defiance of the Emperor; a month's time to be given the Emperor seemed too long, if war was to be begun this year. It was altered, that war should be declared in 20 days after the offers were made, or if he prevents their coming to him. As to the article about separate treating, Francis complains that it is not fair that he should be unable to treat separately for the restoration of his children, as that is the end of the alliance; but Wolsey insisted that their friendship must be such that they can treat of nothing without common consent, else suspicions will arise; the Emperor has many friends in England, and has tried all means to dissuade Henry from this alliance, even by means of women who he thinks are favored by the King; but Wolsey has done what he could to hinder them.

Answered that Francis did not see why he should be prevented from treating for his children, if he provided for Henry's satisfaction; if Henry obtained this, did not think his consent was wanted. It was settled that the article should remain as it was, but a separate one should be inserted in the offensive league, that if the Emperor would at any time return the Princes and give honorable terms to Henry, Francis might receive them without waiting for Henry's consent, and similarly in Henry's case.

Spoke also of the Italian news and of the Pope's cowardice, and his proposal of going to Spain. It was agreed to write to the Datary that the Pope, by advice of Fr. Nicole, wished to send to France, and would not leave Rome for the present. Sent the above articles to the King. Next day, the 23rd, went to Greenwich, where the King kept the feast of St. George. After dinner he led them to the hall where the Queen, the Princess, the queen

Mary.

Mary and a large company were. He told them all to speak to the Princess in French, Latin and Italian; in all which languages she answered them.* She then played on the spinet very well. She is the most accomplished person of her age, to judge from what he (Dodieu) has heard. Was not there, being busy about the two last articles with the Cardinal's doctor, who is very uneasy in his manner and suspicious. The ambassadors wrote to the King after their return, about what Henry had said;—his hopes of bringing back the Pope into the League, his desire to humble the Emperor and invade the Low Countries; that his affairs have always been hindered by the delay in talking of war, and that he intended to visit Francis. Said that this interview would delay the war, and he might entrust everything to the Cardinal; but he answered that he would tell Francis things of which Wolsey knew nothing.

A new power

On the 25th received a letter of the 23rd, bidding them to sign the articles at once, enclosing a power according to the draft sent, and asking for news of the King, Queen, Princess and Cardinal, thanking the latter for the pains he had taken in his affairs. Showed them to Wolsey on the 27th. They relieved him from the distress caused by Clerk's letters of the 17th. He told them that the Scotch queen had left her husband, earl Douglas, for a simple gentleman named Stuart; her son had remonstrated with her, and she intended to leave Scotland and go to France, and she talked of marrying Albany; Henry was much vexed at this, and could not believe that Francis would encourage his sister in her folly; he wished them to tell this to Francis, that she may be sent back to her brother, if she comes into the King's hands. Assured him that the King would not favor her, and that Albany could not intend anything so wicked, and they would send a courier the next day about it. Next day, Dimanche de Quasimodo, Dodieu and Wolsey's doctor† looked over the treaties, and found their copies did not agree as to the article about treating for the restoration of the Princess without Henry's consent, which Wolsey had granted. The Doctor spoke to Wolsey in English, who argued against it as before, and finally said he would think of it. The same day Turenne and Douarty visited the King, who spoke of the delays, and said it would be the end of August before the armies could take the field, and Francis had better reinforce his armies in Italy to defeat Bourbon and the Emperor's forces there; it was necessary to stop his progress there, and depriving him of Italy was the best way to injure him; to this Henry would contribute 100,000 cr. and more without asking for any recompence; he did not give this advice to save the aid he had promised against Flanders, but because he did not think it well to send a large army thither unless to do some great exploit, which cannot be done there now; at the declaration of war, Francis should garrison his frontiers to annoy Flanders, Haynault and Artois during the winter, to assist which Henry would forward troops to Calais, and he should send by sea to break down the dikes of Holland, Zeland and Brabant. finally he sent his recommendation to Francis and Madame, with certain secret messages by Douarty, who came to take leave of him.

On Monday, 29 April, brought the treaties, with the intention of signing them. Met the Doctor in the gallery, who said they could not be signed that day, as there were other matters to attend to. Joined the other ambassadors, who were waiting for Wolsey, whilst he was talking to his colleagues. Thanks they were discussing the making war in Italy. When they met the French, they showed great desire of signing the treaties, which would have been done but for the article about separate treating, which was still under discussion. It was settled that in the separate treaty which states that the treaties depend upon each other, a clause should be added, that as the restoration of the Princes and the payment of Henry's claims are the chief causes of war, the Kings should be bound to make peace if Charles offers to do these things on reasonable terms, and they shall try to make all Christendom join the peace. Knows this article did not please them at first; but it remained thus, and thinks it is like that sent on April 22, except that in the previous one Francis could treat for both objects without Henry's consent, and now Henry is bound to consent. Thinks it much to their advantage, as it is easier for Henry to make peace with the Emperor than for Francis to do so, and this binds Henry so firmly that he cannot abandon them. Discussed the ratification of the treaty of peace, which must be authorised as solemnly and be as stable as their coronation oaths. Wolsey, not content with this, wished it to be ratified by the Three Estates of France. Have often refused this, and explained the French custom. He asked for the ratification by the Estates of Normandy and Languedoc. Demanded in return that of the Estates of England, and told the Doctor that it could not be refused, as an article obliges the Kings to pass the treaty in the form of a law, and no law can be passed in England without this. This objection threw the Doctor into great doubt, and he talked for a long time with the Cardinal, who was much troubled, and recalled the English deputies. After consulting with them, he assured the French that the authorisation of the Estates was not necessary, though he had often said before that it was, and Dodieu was told the same by More; and the Doctor then wished the clause to be taken out, saying that acknowledgment by the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer was sufficient, but finally allowed it to stand, although he does not mean to observe it. This may be occasion for a rupture. April 30, the treaties were signed and sealed. It was agreed that Mr. Poinus (Poyntz) and Clarendieux should go to Spain with the bishop of Tarbe.

1 May, kept at home, for fear of the London artizans, who go in arms "querir le May," and sometimes attack foreigners. 2 May, Douarty returned to France. 3 May, received letters from the King, dated April 23, saying that the Holy League had been confirmed with Venice, although the Pope had left it. 4 May, received others of the 1st, that he would do what Henry wishes about the Scotch queen. On the 4th, Saturday, went to Greenwich after dinner with the bishop of Ely, Rochford, and others. Found the King on his throne, with Wolsey, the ambassadors of the Pope, Venice, and the duke of Bari, and many prelates and nobles. After the King had embraced them, they sat in front of his throne with the Knights of the Garter behind them. Tarbe recited a Latin speech, thanking the King for his good wishes, and saying how Francis desired to maintain his friendship, and to marry the Princess. The King, after consulting with his prelates, told the bishop of London to reply; which he did, standing bareheaded at the foot of the throne, thanking Francis, and promising a more detailed answer. Henry then spoke very graciously to the ambassadors, thanking God that matters were in such good train. They showed their master's letters about the Scotch queen, which pleased him, as well as those about the Holy League. He spoke of the means for bringing back the Pope to the league. Were taken in the evening to a house well furnished for their lodging.

Next day, Sunday, 5 May 1525 (1527), the bishop of London sang mass in the chapel, after which the King swore to and signed the treaty, protestation being made that he would not be obliged to keep it unless Francis did the same by a certain time. Tarbe and Turenne dined with the King; Le Viste and Jean Joachim with Wolsey and other lords. Discussed for a long time with Wolsey the conditions to be offered to the Emperor, but nothing was settled that day. At night Wolsey returned to Westminster; they, to the house in the garden, newly built, near the lists, where a tourney had been held all day. A great supper was given in the house. After supper Henry said to Tarbe what he had before said to Turenne about the war in Italy. The festivities lasted till day. The next day, the 7th, Wolsey declared that the Imperial ambassador had come to him to thank him for the trouble he had always taken to preserve peace between his master and the King; to ask him to continue doing so; to tell him that Francis could not ask for the princess Mary in marriage, as he had promised himself to Madame Helyenor, with whom he would have consummated marriage in Spain if the Emperor had not prevented it on account of his illness; that Francis only wishes to impose upon the King; in proof of this, letters were shown from him to Charles, his wife, and Madame; that the people of Spain had offered him much money and troops to fight the Turk, which he refused for the present, telling them that war could not be made without the union of all Christian princes, which he is trying to procure; he asks for Wolsey's advice thereupon; has sent power and instructions for peace, and is quite ready to conclude it; his wife expects to be confined in June, but she is so weak that the doctors fear she will die, and if so, he wishes to marry the princess Mary, as his people urged him to marry his present wife and not the Princess, as the latter was so young. He offers also Madame Helyenor's daughter to the duke of Richmond, with a dowry of 300,000 or 400,000 ducats.

To this Wolsey had replied that they had heard of the refusal of the Estates to assist the Emperor in his affairs, and their offers to defend Hungary; that Henry and Francis intend to send ambassadors to the Emperor with reasonable terms of peace, and they will accompany him against the Turk; is sure that the kings of England and France, and the Signory, will be reasonable; if Charles had not forgotten the benefits he has received, would consider himself much obliged to him; is sorry for his wife, but such overtures during her life are not honorable; that the King would rather marry the Princess to a simple gentleman than to a prince who has refused her; it is too soon to talk of the duke of Richmond's marriage; that he will probably be able to make a great and honorable match; that he does not wish to prevent the marriage which the Emperor says Francis has contracted, but the letters shown do not seem to be his handwriting, and the artist who has tried to forge them is a bad workman. He showed them other letters of Francis to compare with them. They excused themselves by saying that they were sent to them.

Wolsey then began to talk of the terms to be offered to the Emperor; both his master and himself thought both the Princes should be restored at once for the ransom of a million, saying "quod non est malicia super maliciam mulieris," and that Madame Helyenor, being disappointed, might do some harm to the one who remained; that 500,000 should be paid at once, and children of the noblemen be offered as hostages for the remainder; the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois should remain with Charles during Francis's life; that he should give up Hesdin if the Emperor returns Tournay; the duke of Bari must be restored to Milan, paying the Emperor 50,000 cr. yearly; all exiles to be reinstated; the Emperor shall be excused the 100,000 cr. from Naples during his life, on condition that he has nothing from Milan; the King shall make no more claims on Naples or Milan; Bourbon shall have his revenues; Henry demands payment for his loans to the Emperor, the first payment to be made when the first million (of the ransom) is paid; he demands the kingdom of Castile by right of his predecessors, Tournay and Tournesis according to previous conditions; and 40,000*l.* promised annually as indemnity, which have not been paid. Henry is very anxious for the return of the Princes, and will be content with half the money due to him at the payment of the first million, and the rest annually, as the other million is paid; he will remit his claims to Castile, Tournay, and the 40,000*l.*, till another time.

Thanked the Cardinal, and told him that it was impossible to pay 1,000,000 at once, and that if the Emperor had so much money at once, it might tempt him to make war again. Wolsey replied that he begged Francis to take his advice in good part; Henry would be paid his debts out of the first million; if Charles made war with the rest on Francis, Henry would assist the latter.

On the 8th left London. On the way received letters from the King to Francis and Madame, expressing his satisfaction with the conduct of the ambassadors, and his intention to observe what had been resolved upon.

Received his letters on the 10th. Has certified the King of the new league made with the Pope, as the King will see by his letters to Wolsey. Left the Pope on 1 April, with commission from him to advertise the King of the Pope's necessities. Laurens Toscaine has been sent to France for the same purpose, and the General has also been despatched to Spain to complain of the Imperial troops. Was detained at Civita Vecchia till the 4th. Sends letters from Gregory Casale, "mentioning the successes of Rome." The Pope greatly dislikes making fresh cardinals, and said he would rather lose his right hand than do so for money. Bourbon is rapidly advancing from Florence, expecting to find Rome unfurnished, as the Pope had disbanded his army on the promise of the Viceroy. He was probably there by the 6th. If the army of the League follow they will be "put to a great after deal." Never were Infidels more cruel than the Imperialists. Savone, 11 May. Signed.

3114. The SACK of ROME.

Vit. B. ix.

108.

B. M.

On Saturday, 4th May 1527, Bourbon arrived before Rome, and asked the Pope's consent to his passing to Naples, offering to pay for provisions.
He received a rough refusal from Signor Rana, at the instigation of the Pope, who had received for recruiting his army 300,000 ducats by creating eight new cardinals. On Sunday the 5th, drew off his troops from Rome behind St. Peter's, pretending to cross the Tiber (prendre son passage par le T.); but early on Monday the 6th, whilst there was a great mist, he prepared to assault the town behind the Campo Santo at Thurion Gate, and the said Sieur was among the first to mount the walls, where four ensigns were planted. He was there wounded, and assisted to descend, and carried into a neighbouring chapel, but when the gate of Thurion was taken he was conveyed to the church of Campo Santo. Captain Rana, who was on the wall with 4,000 men, seeing that they retreated, as many men were killed by the artillery of the assailants, cried out that Bourbon, Orange, and four ensigns were taken, in order to encourage them to return to the wall. They, however, retreated to the Place St. Esprit; but Rans left them, and went to the Castle of St. Angelo, where was the Pope, with five or six cardinals. Cardinals "Sanitate Quatuor," who was wounded, and "Ezia" (Cesia?), retired with Rana. The besiegers continued to advance; and the Romans, seeing that Rans had deserted them, tried to escape, some jumping into the Tiber. The Imperialists killed every one they met,—men, women, and children. This lasted from the morning to 2 p.m., during which time Bourbon was killed. Before his death he confessed, received his Creator, and desired to be carried into Milan, though some think that he meant Rome, for he was continually saying "à Rome, à Rome." About two in the afternoon, the Imperialists took the gate of St. Pancras, where they encountered some resistance, and then began to pillage, which lasted at least 10 or 12 days,* without there being any resistance, except in three or four houses, which they mined and blew up. Many people had sent their goods, amounting to two millions of gold, to the house of the Portuguese ambassador, but they were obliged to surrender on promise of their lives. They gave out that as soon as the city was taken, the prince of Orange took possession of the Pope's palace, in which were lodged cardinals Campeggio, Cibo and Rodolpho, "et le Jehan d'Urbain, capitaine des Espaignaers en la chancellerie vies'e (?) maison du duc de Millan." Both the generals tried to stop the pillage, but unsuccessfully, though afterwards the Germans obeyed the Prince, and the Spaniards Capt. d'Urbain. On May 19, the Pope was still in St. Angelo. Before the taking of the city, the Viceroy of Naples and the Pope had made a truce for eight months, during which both armies were to retire, and the Viceroy went with the Pope's maître d'hôtel to persuade Bourbon and the Imperial officers to retreat also; but they took it ill, and told him not to interfere with their affairs. It was reported that the maître d'hôtel was wounded. The Viceroy was obliged to retire to Naples, where he was on the 19th.

Negotiations were carried on between the Pope and the deputies of the prince of Orange, and it is agreed that his Holiness shall pay 300,000 ducats; the cardinals with him, who are De Monte, Farnese, SS. Quatuor, Pizano, Trivolze, Besine (?), Campeggio, Ancona, Cesia, la Minerve (?), St. Egidio, and it is said Ara Cœli, 200,000 ducats; and certain merchants who were with them, 100,000 ducats; that the Pope and eight cardinals shall go as the Emperor's prisoners to Gaeta, and surrender Ostia, Civita Vecchia, Parma, Placentia, and Lucca; and that cardinal "Calonne" (Colonna), who entered four days after the capture, with 8,000 men, shall be vice-pope. "Lequel De Calonne se mist au pallaix St. Geo de Campesfore, et sont avecq luy les Cardin[aux de] Tortosa et Trefort, De Laval, De Ezarinne,† Senne, et T," who, though they were good Imperialists, have redeemed their houses at the following sums: the card. of Tortosa for 40,000 er.; De Laval, 45,000 ducats; De Ezarinne, 35,000; De Sene, 40,000; and De Tarobanche, 25,000. After paying these ransoms, their houses were again plundered, and they have been obliged to retire with card. Colonna.

Meanwhile, the army of the League had been reinforced, and put in order to march against Rome. The Pope was informed thereof by means of a disguised page, and broke off the treaty. They arrived on May 22, and are at l'Insula, four miles from Rome, numbering 30,000, but they have great fear of the Imperialists. Provisions are dear at Rome; but there cannot be great want, as the League cannot prevent the arrival of victuals from Naples.

The Pope was not taken on May 19, and it is said that he has victuals for five or six months. News came to Ligorgne on June 3, that he was not taken.

The Florentines, on hearing of the taking of Rome, drove out the Medicis, and made a signory like that at Venice, and have sent governors to Pisa and Leghorn to govern in their name, and not in that of the Pope; but the castles still hold out for the Medicis.

The Great Chancellor of the Emperor has been sent to Italy with 30,000 d. and other commissions. "La Regente, la Reyne de Navare, apelle dame d'Alanson, Mons. Vandome, le Cardenal (mal volu) de Lorrayne, Mons. de Lottrecht et le Chanslyer." The Viceroy has written to the Emperor (this word in cipher) to come himself, "other in good time to make p." (peace), or else there is no possibility of keeping Italy longer.

From the letters of the Signory [of Venice], 12 May.

The Proveditor of Pisa writes on the 10th from Deruta, that the enemy entered Rome on the 6th, and plundered it, that Bourbon was killed by a musket, and that 3,000 German foot were slain.

The Pope and Cardinals, except Valla and Cesarino, have escaped to the Castle, and with them Renzo and Oratio Baleono. No one was spared by the plunderers.

Desire their ambassador to beg the King and Wolsey for the aid they have long promised, lest the enemy gain everything, and make the Emperor monarch of the world. Will do all they can, but the King knows that their strength is not sufficient to restrain the enemy. Florence has entered their league, and will supply 250 men-at-arms, 500 light horse, and 5,000 foot, till the end of the war, with all necessaries.

3122. JOHN CASALE to WOLSEY.

R. O.

St. P. VI. 578.

Wrote in his last of the sack of Rome. Repeats the contents of his letters, in case they have miscarried, and sends copies of news from the Venetian camp. The Senate have received letters to the same effect as he wrote before, and as he heard from D. Camillus Ursinus, who was present at the storming of the suburbs. The Pope, believing Rome could be defended by 3,000 foot, refused to leave the city, and issued an order forbidding any one, on pain of death, to take anything out of it. This was on the 1st May, when it was reported the enemy had reached Sienna, from which they came by forced marches in five days, and, arriving at night, attacked the town in the morning. Particulars are given in the annexed copies. The enemy arrived before the bridges could be destroyed. If the Pope be not relieved immediately, he will be driven to ignominious conditions.

When the news first came Casale urged the Senate to write to the camp for the duke of Urbino to march to Rome, who was only waiting for orders. Was backed in this by the other ambassadors, and insisted that, even if one army were defeated, they would receive the support of all Christian princes against men who had conducted themselves worse than Infidels. Told them that if their army advanced they would liberate the Cardinals from the castle of St. Angelo, and that they would have the Pope and Florence at their disposal. The Council accordingly, yesterday evening, gave orders to this effect, though they do not expect the city can be recovered, for the Imperialists will fortify themselves, and cannot be driven out. Gives some arguments that he used in answer. Hears that they have appointed Frederic Bozzolo, with a body of horse and foot, to try and relieve the Pope. The same thing is being attempted by signor Rangone, but it will be difficult unless the whole army follow. Hears also that on the 14th the duke of Urbino had advanced towards Rome, and part of his forces had arrived at Orvieto, two days' journey from the city. The Milanese have attacked our forces again at Lodi. Venice, 16th May 1527. Signed,

From the Signory's letters, 16 May.

We have heard from your letters of the 24th and 27th April that the Legate is quite recovered. By letters of the 14th we have heard that our Pisan proveditore has gone to Orvieto, and thence towards Rome, with all our forces, to rescue the Pope from the castle. He thinks that can be done the more easily as Gentile Baglione had left Perugia. Fred. de Bozolo has been sent with forces to liberate the Pope and the Cardinal from St. Angelo. Twelve days ago resolved to elect a captain-general, and increase our forces by sea and land. Are hopeful of the King's support.

Has received no letters from him since he wrote last on the 3rd inst. Was told at Machlyng, on the 21st, that, notwithstanding the corrections that have been done, some Antwerp printers have brought to the market here divers English books, intitled the Ny[we] Testament. Has come hither to see punishment executed. Has found 24 in one [mann]ys hand. Is seeking for more, and trusts shortly to see them burned. The marquis of Antwerp and the drossart of Berghes daily ask for a certification from England of particular articles of heresy, without which they can make no corporal punishment on the printers. Hears that at the last Fran[kfurt] market there were more than 2,000 such English books; but there they favor Luther, and leave all good old customs. Hears that some English disciples of Luther are beginning to translate the Bible into English. The King or Wolsey had better write to my Lady about it.

There is great danger in these Low Countries. Two out of three keep Luther's opinions. Is told there are many in England, but they dare not declare themselves. Has caused the Deputy of our nation here to make a congregation of all the English people here, and read the King's letter to them. He has also issued an order that none of them shall buy, nor sell, nor read such like books, and those that have any must bring them to the Deputy before next Sunday. The people and some Lords here murmur that if the Emperor does not agree to the conditions sent him by the king of England, the latter, by Wolsey's means, will be more favorable to the French than to the Emperor. Could make no other answer but that the King and Wolsey would not incline either way without reasonable cause; and if they knew the trouble taken to preserve peace between Christian princes, they would not marvel at the King's favoring the party which shows himself to be the more reasonable. Neither beeves, muttons nor salt fish was left at my Lord's death, and only 20 marks in money, which is spent long ago, with much more, for which pledges have been given. More money must be borrowed before the funeral, else the house will break and "sparple," which would be a dishonor while the body lies unburied. Can do nothing with the Prince, unless Wolsey will restrain his attendants, and especially his usher Coton, who do all they can to make him and his fellow pupils dislike literature and the clergy. They will not allow the Prince to rise at six, or to attend mass earlier, and during last summer altered all the hours Wolsey had prescribed. In the winter Coton defended the Prince and the other boys in all their negligence. Expostulated with him, and alluded to Wolsey's authority, when he answered that the Cardinal would not dare to speak so if the King were arguing with him about it. He has forbidden Croke to have access to the Prince, even at the hours of teaching, and told him openly before the Prince that he should not go to him without definite letters from the Cardinal. Although he thus keeps his instructor from him, he allows buffoons to sing indecent songs before him, and to abuse the clergy. He has made him despise Croke's authority so much that his studies will be ruined unless Wolsey interposes. He has been taught to say "Præceptor, si tu me verberes, ego te verberabo," and thinks he can say so with impunity when he sees his fellow pupils, his inferiors, laughing at Croke even before his face, and rescued by the grooms when he attempts to punish them. On one occasion Wytyford, a relation of Coton's, said to him, "Quid? Tu nudaveris puerorum nates coram tanto principe?" bidding him take the boy into the chamber if he wished to flog him, and, when he attempted to do so, assisted the boy. One boy, named Serope, who was taught Latin by Croke, follows Coton's example in exciting the others against him, and calling him names, and has ill-treated a boy of good disposition sent by the King, who lives with Croke. Coton excuses all the Prince's faults, telling Croke he is too severe; takes him out for hunting, or other reasons, without Croke's leave; does not allow the boys to ask his leave to be absent from lessons; forbids those who sleep in the Prince's chamber to rise before daylight, or to come to Croke to be taught at night; forbids the Prince to write to the King, to Wolsey, Magnas, or Parr, at Croke's suggestion; takes him out to shoot after dinner, which fatigues him for his lessons; and always interferes if Croke scolds him.

Rome on the 6th, and that the Pope and Cardinals had taken refuge in Sant Angelo. 45,000 have been slain without regard to age or sex; many friars and priests murdered. The Venetians have promised assistance, but I think it will take no effect. The king of France has sent to raise 10,000 Swiss, and says he is hourly expecting news from De Tarbe. It is said that the Imperialists propose that the Pope should surrender Castle Angelo, pay 300,000 ducats, go into Spain, and submit to the Emperor. Francis is willing to accept the two gentlemen recommended by the King, but I think they will not easily be admitted into the chamber. I think Dr. Stevens' oration very eloquent. To this the King accedes, and the Archbishop is appointed assessor for examination of the cause ; and then, after an address by the Cardinal, takes his seat. Then Wolsey, after a protestation of his loyalty, demanded the King's answer to the following schedule :—

Itaque ne videar ista contra suscepti muneris rationem neglexisse, propositum articulum secundum jurisdictionem mihi competentem et vestre Majestatis consensu prorogatum, vestre serenitati obedi, et nunc etiam judicialiter obicio, auditurus quidquid ad justificationem dictarum nuptiarum ex parte vestra dici aut allegari possit."

To this the King read his reply from a written paper, as follows:—

"Quod ad articulum p[re]dictum attinet verum et notorium fatemur, ac temporibus et locis opportunis libentissime ostendemus quod ad justificationem actarum nuptiarum poterimus adducere; nunc autem quoniam judic[i]is semper adesse ac personaliter comparere Reg[is] administ[r]ationi vacantes non poterimus, procuratorem dare ut liceat pet[iti]mus qui nostram vicem suppleat, ac in absentia nostra nos[tram] causam agat."

Whereupon the King nominates as his proctor Dr. John Bell; and Richard Wulman is appointed promoter of the suit.

"His ad hunc [modum] p[re]dictus magister Ricardus Wulman promotor officii ejusdem officii petitionem interposuit in hanc quæ subsequitur formam:—

"Reverendissime Pater atque amplissime jud[ex], in hoc judicio illæ mihi partes mandatæ [sunt ut executi]oni officii diligenter intendam, illudque p[ro]moveam primum peto quoniam articulus de se omnibus notorius sit, prout etiam ex adversis conceditur, pro notorio etiam pronuncietur, judicetur et declaretur.

"Secundum quam petitionem p[re]dictus reverendissimus Dominus decretum hujusmodi ex scripto recitatum de concilio assessoris sui p[er]"

• (Here occurs a passage quite unintelligible from mutilation.)

Upon a petition for delay the Cardinal appoints a certain day for further hearing the cause. On the 20th May the King's proctor appeared before Wolsey and the Archbishop, and put in the following justification on the King's behalf:—

"In Dei nomine, amen. Coram vobis [reverendissimo in Christo patre et domino,] domino Thomæ miseratione divina [titulo] Sanctæ Cecilie [Sacerdotis] Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ presbytero Cardinali Eboracensi [archiepiscopo] Angliæ primati et Canc[ell]ario ac Apostolicæ Sedis non solum[nato] sed etiam de latere legato: Pars illustrissimi et [invicti]ssimi p[re]ncipis et domini nostri, domini Henrici Dei gratia Angliæ et Franciæ Regis, Fidei Defensoris et domini Hiberniæ, [in] confirmationem, decl[arationem] et justificationem matrimonii ab [illu]strissimo principe nostro cum illustrissima domina Catherina quondam Ferdinandi His[paniarum] Regis defuncti filia contracti ati et consummati [per] reverendissimam pater[n]itatem vestram eidem objecti et (?) "Q[ui] in infrascripto articulo proponit ad omnem juris effectum con[jun]ctim et divisim.

"In primis dicit quo idem princeps Arthurus frater illustrissimi Regis nostri cum illustrissima domina Catherina illustrissimi Regis Aragoniæ [filia] efflu matrimonium contraxerit, illudque sane tam tanquam cum v eamque carnaliter cognoverit. Sufficient cause having been shown why the court should take cognisance of the suit, the proceedings were adjourned to Thursday next:—

"Quo die [Jovis], viz. xxiij. die mensis Maii anno Domini supradicto

[dictus] Johannes Bell procurator predicti illustrissimi et invictissimi principis Henrici Octavi Dei gratia Angliæ et Franciæ Regis, Fidei Defensoris et Domini Hiberniæ, &c., [a] predicto reverendissimo domino instantè requisiit quod ipse admissus

"[Reveren]dissime pat[er] atque ampli[sime] judex nisi pater hunc diem [cons]tituit ad audiendum paternitatem vestram objectione mat[rimonii] ne ex parte in[vic]tissimi et illustris[simi] principis Henrici Octavi Angliæ [et Franciæ] Regis, Fidei Defensoris et Domini Hiberniæ me . . . [instant]issime peto ut ea admitti ad sciendum et determinandum . . assignare [ad pr]obandum contenta in eodem."

To this the Cardinal and his assessor agreed, and a day was assigned, the octave of St. Michael, "ad" The King's proctor then produced the bull of Julius II., dated vii. kal. Jan. 1503, which is cited at length. Wulman, as promoter of the suit, asks a decree that a copy of it be published, and a term assigned within which objections might be alleged. This is granted, and the morrow of Ascension Day following appointed for stating objections.

On the morrow of Ascension Day, viz. 31 May, Wulman produced a set of objections, viz., that it was notorious prince Arthur had married Katharine, cohabited with her, and carnally known her;—that the King married her after Arthur's death, and still cohabits with her;—and a number of others, including, so far as can be ascertained, the usual objections against the Pope's power of dispensing in the case, and also that the King, when he came to the age of puberty, made a protest against the marriage. Of which objections Master John Bell desired a copy to be given him; which was granted.

"Ac ulterius, quum idem rever[endissimus] Cardinalis causam] hanc cui[us] cognitionem cum consilio [in]gressus est, tam arduum videbat adeo cuius a pendet tam ex sac[ro]rum ca]nonum interpretatione et sententia qua[m] deliberand' et consulend' censuit, Eorum procedend' decrevit ad dilucidationem præ [the]ologos quam jurisperitos vocandos et citandos [et cons]ilium interposituros, animique sui sententiam des Episcopos Rossien' et Lincoln', necnon London' et. quam plures."

Instructions to Sir Francis Poyntz, sent to the Emperor "ensuing the tenor of certain treaties" made with the French king, to be communicated to the French ambassadors, with whom he is to act for deliverance of the French king's children, &c.

1. It has been agreed between Henry and Francis, that the latter shall use all efforts to bring the Emperor to peace, and the liberation of the children on reasonable conditions; that failing, to make war against him in the Low Countries. Passing by the court of France, Poyntz is to make the King's most cordial recommendations to Francis and his mother, communicate his instructions to the bishop of Bath, and proceed on his journey accordingly. As Francis will despatch his ambassador at the same time, Poyntz is to join him, and on his arrival communicate his charge with the bishop of Worcester and Lee, who shall confer upon it with the French ambassadors. The arrival of Poyntz is to be notified to the Emperor by Lee and Worcester, and they are to declare their charge in conjunction with the French ambassadors, requesting a speedy audience, exhorting him out of love to the King, the quiet of Christendom, &c., to give them a friendly hearing. At the audience Poyntz shall deliver him the letters from the King and Wolsey, after they have determined among themselves who shall speak for the French king, and who for the king of England, taking care to agree in their argument, enlarging upon the malice of the Turks, the extirpation of heresy, &c.

2. After pointing out that the great cause of all these evils is the present hostility between Francis and the Emperor and the captivity of the children, they shall say that Francis is now ready to make honorable offers, to which he has been induced by Henry's intercession, larger than have ever yet been heard of in such a case.

3. They shall say they are jointly sent for satisfaction of the sums due to the King, the terms of which are long since past; and that, without entering into particulars, Francis is willing to pay 2,000,000 cr. for the redemption, one moiety in hand, and the rest in three years, with certain sureties and conditions; that Francis will exchange Hesling for Tournay; that the duke of Bourbon shall have his duchy of Bourbon and his rights; that Francis Sforza shall enjoy Milan, paying the Emperor a pension. As for Henry's part, seeing that the Emperor is to receive a million of money, he trusts the Emperor will pay his debts to the King;—that as Tournay was delivered by Henry to the French king on certain conditions, the capture of it by the Emperor cannot prejudice the King's rights. If, therefore, he intends to keep it he must make the King a convenient recompense. That although the King has other claims on the Emperor, if the Emperor will accept the French offers, and satisfy the debts, he is content to remit them; otherwise he shall claim them in full.

If the ambassadors find that the offers will be accepted, but the payment of the debt and the recompense for Tournay are objected to, rather than that the peace should not ensue, they shall offer to take a moiety of the debts, of the first million, and the other half of the first instalment, and they shall require Charles to send a commission to his ambassador to conclude the same in England. If he refuses, they may conclude it there, taking precautions that there be no delay, and that the articles on all sides be put in writing; information of the same to be sent to the Pope, the Viceroy, the duke of Bourbon, and hostilities to cease. If the Emperor make any other demands, they shall say they have no commission, and they think no further demand will be accepted, but they are willing to write. If the Emperor refuse audience, or to answer after audience within twenty days, the heralds, whom they shall keep secret with them, shall give intimation of war in the terms here sent. This declaration to take effect after forty days; on which the ambassadors shall ask for a safe-conduct, and take their leave. Signed by the King, top and bottom.

Secret instructions for Sir Francis Poyntz, sent to the Emperor.

As he has no experience in these matters, he shall show his secret and open instructions to the bishop of Bath, and go with him to the King and my Lady. The ambassadors shall say that the King thinks the articles touching the money are reasonable, and beg Francis to strain a point. If he cannot pay the 2,000,000 at once, they shall offer reasonable qualifications for the second million; insisting, however, on the full sum, and the redemption of both children at once. He shall also communicate his charge to the English ambassadors in Spain, for whom certain secret articles are reserved, by which they will perceive that it is the King's great desire to decline hostility with the Emperor, if possible; avoiding, at the same time, any suspicion on the part of the French. They shall moderate, as far as they can, the tendency of the French king's ambassadors to exasperate the Emperor; and, as he may not be induced to comply at first, to persuade him, little by little, reasoning with him and his Council, without provoking the suspicion of the French, and begging them to remember the perils of the time, and the unreasonableness of requiring Francis to return to captivity. The arguments urged by the Emperor in this behalf are sophistical, and if adversity should befall him he will find none to assist him. They are to urge him to leave wilful counsels.

In the article touching Bourbon they must represent that the best has been done that could be,—that Christendom must not be kept in perpetual war on his account,—and if the provision is not sufficient the Emperor had better provide some other recompense for him. They shall also insist upon the charges incurred by the continuance of the war, and the difficulty the French king will have to pay a suitable ransom. All these things will tend to inculcate moderation. The ambassadors shall know that two commissions have been issued by the King and delivered to Poyntz,—one conformable to the effect of the Emperor's commission sent to Don Inigo. If that be objected to, Poyntz has another in more ample form. Touching the article of Tournay, they shall insist upon the costs incurred by the King in its conquest, but for the Emperor's sake he is content to take a competent sum to be paid after certain rates, and for his debts they shall name 20,000*l.*, or as much under or over as they can get. Touching Milan they shall persuade Francis not to stick much on a pension to be granted to him out of that duchy. If he will not comply, Poyntz shall propose 50,000 ducats to be paid to the Emperor, and 50,000 to the French king. If the Emperor insists that he has sent a sufficient commission to Don Inigo in England, according to his communication by Bluemantle lately sent, and that till he knows what is done here he cannot proceed further, they shall say that though Inigo on his audience affirmed he had such a commission, he objected to that of the French king, which is only looked upon by the French as a mere excuse for delay, and therefore they have commandment to proceed, notwithstanding Inigo's commission. If they find the Emperor obstinate, they shall take all the means they can to make known to the nobles of Spain the King's loving proceedings in this matter, and how reluctantly he is compelled to declare war against the Emperor, as by their persuasion he may possibly be moved to moderation.

3145. WOLSEY to ———.

Although in instructions given to Poyntz "concerning such conditions as by the bishop of Worcester the King's almoner and him, jointly with the bishop of Tarbes" and other ambassadors resident with the Emperor, mention is made that they shall require the Emperor, if he accepts the peace, to send a commission here for that purpose, or that the ambassadors shall conclude it there, &c., as it is thought by the French king that any cessation of arms will prejudice his affairs in Italy, and benefit the Emperor, and no peace in reality ensue, the king of England desired the bishop of Worcester and Sir Francis Poyntz to have the articles reduced to writing at once, and sent to England to be engrossed. They are not to vary from this instruction, nor are they to accept any cessation of arms until the treaties of peace are fully finished, without the consent of the French king. If the Emperor will not consent to send a commission here, the ambassadors shall proceed according to their instructions. The bishop of Tarbes has shown on the part of the French king that he will find means that commissions shall be there for the Venetians, and whatever else is necessary. Signed.

3147. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

Sends letters from France and Italy in confirmation of the cruel spoils and murders committed by the Imperialists at Rome, who spared neither age, sex, nor religion, and the danger of the Pope and Cardinals, who fled into the castle of St. Angelo, unless they be shortly succoured by the army of the League. This must stir the hearts of all Christian princes. If the Pope be slain or taken it will hinder the King's affairs not a little, which have been going on hitherto so well. Sends letters of my lord of Rochester, showing his opinion on the matter, though it may be thought "that having some conjecture his said opinion proceedeth rather of affection than of sincerity of his learning or scripture," especially his strained interpretation of Illud quodcumque solvereis erit solutum, which would enable the Pope to dissolve all ties (tollere omnia).

Encloses letters from Sir John Wallop, stating that the king of Bohemia will not let him pass to the Waywode. Supposes that Henry will make no sticking if the things in his letter be true. Hopes the news of the death of the Great Turk and his elder son is true, though the cruelty of Christian princes is worse than that of the Turks. Westminster, 2 June. Signed.

On consulting those dumb masters, such authorities as he had at hand, finds that they differ greatly among themselves, some declaring that the thing is prohibited by divine law, others that it is lawful. On mature consideration, thinks he sees an easy answer to the arguments of those who deny its lawfulness, but not to those of the other side. Cannot see any sound reason to show that it is prohibited by divine law for a brother to marry the wife of a brother who has died without children; and, considering the fulness of authority given by our Lord to the Pope, who can deny that the latter may give a dispensation to that effect, for any serious cause? But, even admitting the arguments to be balanced on either side, Fisher would be decided by this—that it belongs to the Pope to clear ambiguous passages of Scripture, after hearing the opinions of the best divines; otherwise it is in vain that Christ has said, Quicquid solveris in terra erit solutum in calis, &c. As the Pope, therefore, has more than once by his act declared that it is lawful to dispense in this case, Fisher thinks this alone should determine the question. Has, accordingly, no hesitation in declaring that the dispensation is within the Pope's power. Rochester.

Wrote on the 24th May that he had sent one to Bayonne with a safe-conduct for Poynes and the bishop of Tarbes, but can hear nothing of them. Has heard of the league of Italy, and the determination of the King to send 10,000 men against the Emperor, and that the Cardinal should go over to arrange a marriage between the Princess and the French king or the Dauphin;—that you are sending to the Emperor security for 2,000,000 and the restitution of Sforza. Refers him to his letter to the Cardinal. The Emperor is much abashed, and Inigo condemned for being so scrupulous. I have said I do not believe it, and that you would not break with the Emperor except with great cause. The Emperor is sorry for Bourbon's enterprise against Rome.

This day the Prince was baptised with much pomp. His name is Philip. His godfathers are the Constable and the duke of Alva; his godmother the queen of Portugal. The Emperor told the Nuncio that Bourbon had no commission to act as he had done. Though it may be expedient to have a

B. M.

Visited J. Almain on the 24th May, who, upon my denying that I had received any news, drew from his bosom a folded paper, written in Italian, stating that a new league between France and England had been published in England on the 5th May, containing also certain terms for sending an army to Italy, and that the King intended to have an interview with Francis. It is said also that both Princes are sending here Poynes and the bishop of Tarbes, offering 2,000,000 for the liberation of the children; also demanding that the queen of Portugal be sent into France, Francis Sforza restored, the King's debts paid, and to denounce war in event of the Emperor refusing. He told me that the French ambassadors had left England, 9 May. I answered that I could not believe that the King would send 10,000 men into Italy, and if the King broke with him it would be Inigo's fault, "that converteth the Emperor's mind so much" from the King and Wolsey.

Describes his interview with Almain, asserting that Inigo might have made fuller demonstration of the Emperor's intentions. Almain said in excuse that Bluemantle had arrived the day after the league was published, and that afterwards Wolsey would not hear Don Inigo, but told him they would send articles to the Emperor; which, Lee said, was incredible. "Doubtless I found him much abashed; and so, I think, they be all." Asked if they were going to cast away the King, and thus let the French steal their best friend? "What would you we should do? saith he. Would you that we should take laws of the Frenchmen, although we were constrained to dance after their pipe manlgré our heads?" Lee said that was not necessary; that even now they might send to Mons. de Harbrach, who had left for England, and write to the King and Wolsey their full mind; and that they ought not to lose the King for mountains of gold. Almain said it was good counsel, but what if England meanwhile sent them a defiance, which it seemed by the herald that she intended? "I said nay, we come not to defiance afore parole. We shall first propose, and then hear what you will say; this is the common order;" adding that if even now they condescended to the King's mind, pretending that it had been their own mind always, they would not find the King stone or iron. At length he said he would speak to the Emperor about sending after Harbrach; "but I doubt of these Spaniards' heads," he added, "when they shall hear these things."

Hope, if he has been indiscreet, the King will impute it to his simpleness, and partly sorrow and abashment that things should have come to such a pass. Suggests reasons against the King's going to war with the Emperor:— 1, that it was at Henry's request the Emperor delivered Francis on such easy terms, which is considered the sole cause of war now; 2, the old amity of England, Burgundy and Castile; 3, the injury that will be done to trade; 4, and to the whole of Christendom; 5, that the Emperor has shown so much consideration for the King, in renouncing the article of Burgundy, which France alone could never have brought him to, and his willingness that the peace should be treated in England. He sticks at nothing now but (1) that he will admit no delays of payment, so as to prevent occasion of new war, which seems a reasonable objection; and (2) the restitution of Francis Sforza. 6. Amity with the Emperor will be a great stay to the King's affairs, and make the French afraid to break with him. 7. If a breach do occur, these countries may be gladder to join with France than with us, especially if the marriage with the queen of Portugal take effect.

When Almain asked him to write to Wolsey, Lee reminded him he had formerly made him write things "that followed not so," as when he stated that the secret instructions had been sent by Echingham. Almain said he had excused Lee in letters to Brian Tuke. This was Friday the —* May. On the Sunday† Almain came to his house, which he never did before, and told him that the Emperor was anxious above all things to maintain the amity with England, and that they had now given by Bluemantle full authority to Don Inigo to conclude. "I pray God, said I, you may better do than you have done in times past, lest you make the thing in worse case than it is yet." Almain said with this clause he thought the Emperor would put all in the King's hands. Lee said he was afraid such respect to the Emperor's honor could not be had now as might have been.

On Wednesday, [29]‡ May, he came again, and showed him a minute in Spanish from the Emperor to Don Inigo, stating that he had received his letter by Bluemantle, and letters from the King by his ambassadors, "the tenor whereof he expressed, and the form of passport granted upon the same, &c.;" that he understood such and such articles (viz. those shown him by John Almain in the paper written in Italian); that he wondered if such a report were true, as he loved the King above all princes, as shown by his willingness to have this treaty negotiated in England. Some words were added, which he told Almain had better be out; that he marvelled if the King would pass over to see Francis, and feared the latter would allure him to the continuance of war. He commanded Don Inigo to agree to everything the King and Wolsey desired; adding, however, "as he shall think convenient,"—which words, Lee told Almain, "might be a starting hole," adding that he saw no words of undoubting confidence, "viz. that you put all your whole affairs in their hands." Almain promised to make a note of it, and speak to the Emperor, but said a request must be added that the King and Wolsey have respect to the Emperor's honor. Told him he might be sure they would without such addition. He sent word the same night that the Emperor was contented with the clause; but I desired that he would not have the letters signed till I had seen him.

Visited him on the morrow, being Ascension day, and saw the minute to Inigo, commanding him to agree to everything that he thought "convenient" to the treaty. 2. That he should declare, on the Emperor's behalf, that he is willing the King and Wolsey should take his affairs into their hands, trusting they would have respect to his honor. Neither he nor Worcester was satisfied with these terms. I told him, therefore, that unless the King had absolute and irrevocable power in this matter, you would not desire Francis to send ambassadors to England. De Pratt was present, showing himself a sorrowful man, and expressing his great goodwill to England, and both avowed that the French king had proposed to the Emperor to make a joint attack upon Calais, and he would never consent to have the peace concluded in England. Pressed Almain that the clause should be drawn expressing absolute confidence in the King and Wolsey, and letters be sent to that effect. Combated Almain's assertion that they would seem to do it for fear, and there was no need to include it in letters to the King and Cardinal. Declined to send the Emperor's letters by one of his servants, but consented, if there was good grounds given for settling a peace, to ask the bp. of Worcester.

At evening in the monastery of St. Francis, Almain and De Pratt met us, when the latter said that the Emperor not a little marvelled at the treaty between France and England, considering that the alliance of his house with England is ancient out of mind, and that he was resolved to write to the King on that subject, rehearsing the words as they appear in Almain's minute, and not as they are thought necessary; and he asked us to convey his letters to England. We refused unless we might see the letters. They urged what they had written was equivalent to what we wished, but they would not con-descend to the words we proposed. My lord of Worcester and I declined to send any one except we might see "undoubtful matter to conclude peace." *

A merchant, named Thos Traversse of Bilboa, complains that they have been much troubled of late by a commission sent to Biscay. They are called to account for their merchandize 20 years past, on suspicion of exporting gold. Has desired the Emperor's letters that the merchants may not be troubled. 2. Duplicate of the preceding, abridged, with slight alterations of order, &c., and the following additions:—

Have heard no word of the Ambassadors' coming, or where they be. His servant still awaits them at Bayonne with the safe-conduct. A post has come through France from Flanders, but can tell nothing of them. "I perceive that of late John Almain conveyed letters for the Emperor to the Captain of Bayonne and Robert Tette." News of the siege of St. Angelo and death of Bourbon. The Emperor, they say, is very sorry for the siege. Will follow Wolsey's directions, and use his own cipher.

"Now, because these orators tarry so long, the saying is here grounded upon letters coming out of France, the date of 24th of May, that the said orators bring all good news with them, and the Emperor shall be well content. We do all that we can to put them [in] that mind that never other was meant."

The said letters state that the Pope is dead, and Andrew Doria taken, and that Bourbon has made composition with the Florentines. There is circulated here an indiction of a council by Pompey Colonna, at which, it is said, the Emperor is dissatisfied. He will go into Arragon after the Queen's purification, where he shall receive, according to ancient custom, 500,000 ducats. Valladolid, 5 June 1527.

Answers the objection that Wolsey loses on the money paid by the prior of St. Mary's. By no other way is it so economical. The export of gold is forbidden here, and conveyance is very expensive. The last payment that Lee received himself was in double ducats, single ducats, crowns, royals of Spain, stuvers, and black money. John Almain has given no help, because of the rumor of war. Found the authority sent by Wolsey for frightening the bp. of Palence of no use, as it had neither witness nor notary's signature. The bp. of Toledo now owes a great sum. Valladolid, 5 June 1527.

5 June 1527. Wolsey has committed his matter to Messrs. Roche, Wythpoll, and Nic. Warryn, who will, no doubt, reckon truly between them; but if Wm. Clay makes untrue reckoning, the arbitrators cannot go further than the books; and as Wolsey favors Clay, Ap Howell will have no remedy. Dares not go abroad, for Hottry and Statham have got a writ against him, and hears that Clay has a privy seal for him also. Asks for Cromwell's advice. Thanks him for delivering the two bales of camlet to his wife, and that his cousin and Edmund Gyfford have entered themselves as his sureties in the actions against him.

Hol., pp. 2. Add.: To the right worshipful Mr. Cromwell.

* In the duplicate despatch Lee says that he himself "for his simplicity" had yielded to the Emperor's request, for fear of being thought uncourteous; but that my lord of Worcester, "like a man of further cast and experience," saw many objections to this, which he would doubtless report.

Extracts of letters from the Prothonotary Casale, 9 June.

Letters have come from the army, of the 2nd inst., stating that they have determined to go to Viterbo on account of their want of victuals, and it was understood that the Pope was treating for a most disgraceful concord. Owing to the fault of the forces of the League, the Pope is compelled to give himself up at the discretion of the enemy, to his own destruction. The Imperialists demand 400,000 ducats, and the Pope and all the Cardinals are in their power. Some are of opinion that the Viceroy will treat the Pope badly. Thinks, himself, that he will dissemble till he has extorted all the money. Wishes the allied forces had not promised to come to the Pope's assistance, for then we should not have suffered so many ills, nor would the Pope have been removed from Rome. As his Holiness's expectations are quite destroyed, the Imperialists will be able to go where they like. Hopes they will first go to the duchy of Urbino, and punish the Duke as he deserves for having destroyed the Pope and Italy. He allowed, besides, the nephew of Vitelli and Pietri Maria Rosso to leave the camp, and go over to the

Unless the French king undertakes all that necessity, expediency, and honor compel him to perform, everything will go wrong.

The Viceroy went to Rome, and had an interview with the Pope in the castle, but what was done is not known. The prince of Orange was very ill from a gunshot wound.

3171. [NARRATIVE of VISCOUNT LISLE.]

R. O.

On Monday, 27 May 19 Hen. VIII., we came out of Calais. Were met by De Byze (Bies), capt. of Bologne, within three leagues of Bologne, with all his company of horsemen. He gave us a great dinner in the castle, and escorted us to Abbeville, where we were met, first by the count De Bryane, cousin to Vendôme, Mons. de Kyrby, Mons. de Rambeurs, and many others, and, half a mile from the town, by the mayor and 24 of the best citizens, who made us a proposition in French, and sent 20 great pots of wine to our lodging. Were feasted by the Count as long as we remained at Abbeville. On Ascension even† the bp. of Amyas came to us, who had been ordered by the King to conduct us to court. On Friday Mons. de Pienes came to us at Flyscourte with a like charge, and at St. Denis I was met on Thursday by my lord of Bath, and after dinner by the archbishop of Burgeus (Bourges), Mons. de Guys de Gié, and the Grand Escuyer, who conducted us to our lodgings at Paris.
 Next Thursday the bishop of Amiens, viscount Turayn, and Mons. de Pienes, conducted us to court. At the stair's foot of the King's chamber we were met by Mons. de Guyse, Mons. de Vauldemont, brothers of the Duke of Lorraine, and Francis Mons. de Nevers, who brought us to the King's presence. Afterwards visited my Lady. With the King were the king of Navarre, the cardinal of Lorraine, De Guys, and De Vauldemont, his two brothers, the duke of Vendôme, and Mons. St. Pol, his brother, the master, and the admiral, Lautrec, &c. With my Lady were the queen of Navarre, her daughter, Madame Renée, the king of Navarre's sister, the duchess of Vendôme, and her daughter, with old Mons. Montmorency.

Had one public audience on Saturday, Whitsun eve.‡ The great hall of the place was hung with fleurs de lis; the King, in his cloth of estate, in a gown of purple velvet furred with sables, his hose and doublet white, sat in a chair of three stairs high, below which, at each corner, kneeled a gentleman usher all the time of the oration. The king of Navarre sat on the King's right in a little chair. More than two yards from him, on a form at the side, sat Messrs.
 de Vendôme, de St. Pol, de Guys, and de Lorraine, and beneath that form the three heralds in their coats of arms. On the King's left, a little further removed than the king of Navarre, sat the Legate, the Pope's cousin; and "just

on his nether hand," in another chair, the cardinal of Lorraine; and a good yard from him, in another chair, sat the chancellor of France in his rochet as a bishop, with hood of black satin. About a yard from him, upon a form, sat the ambassadors,—first the Pope's, then the king of Bohemia's, next the Venetians', and last the duke of Milan's. The last, though they were on the side, were nearer to the King than we three in height, who sat in the midst, and opposite to him, about 15 or 20 paces from him, on a long form covered with purple velvet. My lord of London sat in the middle, I on his right, and Mr. Browne on his left. About and behind the King were all the great lords temporal, some leaning on the pommels of his chair. Lantree and the Great Master stood on either side; the Admiral and others behind, within a space of two yards between the wall and the back of the King's chair. The archbishops and bishops were seated on forms and stools behind us, none so high as we sat by four yards. Behind the bishops were bars, and also behind the ambassadors and great lords. My lord of Bath's oration lasted almost half an hour, and was answered by the Chancellor, sitting in his chair, and his cap on his head, "never putting it off for naming of the King his master, nor of any other prince, till he had done; and then he rose out of his chair and made us a little reverence, saying Diri." After this the King talked with us half an hour, and bade us bon soir and bonne nuit.

Next day, Whitsunday, when it was arranged the King should take his oath, we were conducted to his chamber by the abp. of Bourges and others, and were entertained by the cardinal of Lorraine, the king of Navarre, the Legate, and Vendôme, until he came out of his privy chamber; on doing which he bade us good morrow, and went straight to take his mule to ride to Notre Dame. Describes the order in riding. In the choir of the great church the King had a little altar dressed for him, to the right of the high altar, about two yards lower. Beneath that was a long form covered with purple velvet, embroidered with fleurs de lis of gold. The cloth was so large it covered both the form, and all the ground within the King's travers, or large cloth of estate, "which was open both afore and behind, and the side to the queenward, and close at the wall, and it was all of the same purple velvet, embroidered with flower de lysys of gold." Within the form and under the travers, hard to the wall, was set a chair, in which the King sometimes sat, covered with the same embroidered cloth. Outside the travers sat the king of Navarre, in a chair of crimson velvet, and at his foot was a long form, right against the King's little altar, covered with purple velvet; on this we sat. About seven or eight paces behind us sat the Chancellor in a chair of black leather; and on the other side of the high altar, in two chairs of crimson velvet, sat the Legate and cardinal of Lorraine, right against us. Mass ended, the Legate gave his blessing standing, with his back to the high altar, "and then, afore the high altar, afore the King, stood a learned man of Florence, and made an oration in Latin very well, in lauding the peace and the amity of these two Kings." The King then came to the high altar, made his oath upon the mass book, and kissed it, and desired two notaries to make an instrument thereupon. On this trumpets and sackbuts played, and the choir sang the Te Deum. We then went on foot with the King, in the same order we came in, to one of the canons' houses, where, in a large parlor, was made a "hawt jase" for the King to dine in. His board was covered when we came in, and the King sat in the midst of the board in a large cloth of estate. Describes the order of the banquet. "When the King drank, he was served always with three persons. The first brought alone his cup; the second brought a leyer with water; and the third, which was of the cellar, brought a flagon. And after the assay taken, the cupbearer holdeth afore him his cup covered in the one hand, and the cup of assay in the other, or setteth it on the board till the King drinketh. And when either the king of Navarre, the Legate or the Cardinal did drink, a gentleman brought them a cup or a glass uncovered." After dinner the King talked with us and other ambassadors till evensoong, when we took leave.

Describes minutely a "festyn" which took place on Thursday night in the same hall where "our oration" was made at the palace, the roof and sides of which were covered with rich hangings and "rolls of green box with garlands of the same; and in the garlands were either the arms of England and France, or else visages of antyks." When the King and we were come to the high dais, the young lords and gentlemen began to dance till night came. "And then the Kyng weshyd alone, and satt down; and the qween of Navarre weshyd togedyr."† The viscount of Toreyn carved before the King; M. de Guise, of Lorraine, before the king of Navarre and my lady Rénée; and M. de Guise de Goe, before the queen of Navarre. Each of them had a gentleman to bring them drink. After supper they began to dance again, and the King went in maskyr with Mr. Brown and many of the young lords, and danced. There were four kinds of masks: two with long gowns and hoods, and great plumes on the the head of divers colors; and one of coats of white satin with laces and cuts. Two were after the Turkish fashion. "And then was a play of shepherds which brought in the Ruin of Rome. After was a proper device of two angels brought in half skochyns, with a joiner's plane in each of their hands, which in French is called eng peccie, and ever planed those half skochyns, so that they made them one whole skochyn, which a whole [was] half white, half red. And besides that, the one of those angels had a long branch of a rose in his hand; and written in his breast, in great letters, Angleterre, and the other France. And so lovingly holding, they both this hoole skochyn joining made their reverence and departed." The maskers then danced again till two in the morning. I then took my leave of the King and my Lady, and of the queen of Navarre, and returned to my lodging.

R. O.

Did not arrive at Peterborough before 13 June, having been much troubled with sciatica and a cough, which took away his stomach. Delivered Wolsey's letters to the abbot of Peterborough, and used what persuasions he could to induce him to further Wolsey's pleasure; but he declares he will keep his office, that he is as able as ever for it, and that he will ride to Wolsey to prove it. The truth is, he is very impotent, and the Bishop has commanded him to remain in his monastery for fear of injuring himself. Perceives that he intends to make friends, so as to get the King and Wolsey's favor. Thinks two coadjutors should be appointed to him, else the monastery will not prosper, for temporal men have more access to him than his brethren, and none know the state of the house. Will handle him more straitly this afternoon. Wishes to know what to do with him if he will not listen to reason. Will stay at Peterborough and Spalding till he hear from Wolsey. Received his letter, dated Lambeth, 26 May, informing the writer that the Archbishop had lately got into his hands "all the books of the New Testament translated into English, and printed beyond the sea, as well those with the glosses joined unto them as th'other without the glosses," for 66*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* Thinks he has done a gracious and a blessed deed. As the Archbishop has written that other bishops in the province ought to contribute to the expense, and notify their contributions to Will. Potkyn, the writer is content to advance 10 marks. Thinks that this is sufficient for his quota. If not, will be glad to conform himself, in this or any other matter concerning the Church, to the Archbishop's wishes. Hoxne in Suffolk, 14 June 1527.

Has received his letter by the writer's brother-in-law, desiring him to write no more at present about his affair, but trust to him, if the times should change (which God forbid), to have a safe-conduct. Has spoken with the receiver of Mena, de Nevers, who has been long at Paris with your uncle, about his goods in Flanders. He has sent Monsieur 600 livres of rent, and is much beloved by the Grand Master here, and favors the writer. He has promised to procure for me 12,000 florins on change. He is always willing to accommodate your uncle and you. If he have the receiver with him, has no fear in Flanders. Wishes him to come away shortly to make up for lost time. The arrest made by Jenoit (?) in your name, which you promised to raise, has given me much trouble. Must have patience, however, as it will not do to lose 50 out of 110. Is told he must get a quittance of Jehan Gaeton, which he ought to have dated on the day of the bond. The rest is lost because he has made cession de biens (become bankrupt). R. O.

Have, according to Wolsey's command, delivered to my Lord of St. Mary's Abbey, York, certain parcels of plate of my lord of Northumberland, late deceased, amounting to 666*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*; which money they have received from the Abbot, and therewith buried the said Lord. There were neither priests, scholars, poor folk, noblemen, nor gentlemen at the burial to the number they had prepared for, Whitsunday being so nigh, so that a good sum was reserved both of the money for the "doole" and for the house-keeping at the time of the burial. Had proportioned the liveries of divers prices, some 10*s.*, some 6*s.* 8*d.* and less, but the purveyors could not find cloth of so great value in the country; and as the time was too short to send to London they had to take coarser cloth, which saved still more money.

Have discharged the household, according to Wolsey's letter of the 11 June, received on Friday. Paid them according to a book made by Will. Worme, and delivered to the writers by Ambrose Yrton; though, where it did not quite agree with my lord's "Chequiroull" here, they have followed the latter. The dean of York, with the aid of my lord of Cumberland, has taken a view of the Earl's plate and jewels, of which they send an inventory for my lord Legate. Have advised the dowager of Northumberland with her children to remain with my lord of Cumberland, who has offered her his house, "and to be as chief lady and mistress of the same." She has, however, made answer that she is too weak and ill to undertake the journey. She evidently does not wish to live in Craven, for the coldness of the air, and would be glad to remain here, or be with my lady Pykering in this country, being of kin to my Lord her son, until otherwise provided for. She is willing to live poorly, and will be at pains to please Wolsey. My lord her son, and her children, go with my lord of Cumberland till Wolsey's pleasure be known. Wresill, 17 June. Signed.

St. P. 1. 193.

Hears by De Vaulx, the ambassador here, that Francis is much occupied in despatching Lotrec, and would therefore that Wolsey put off his journey till Monday or Tuesday se'night. As the time may be spent by Wolsey to the quiet of the realm, and the "ordering of these seditious preachers," and he will have better opportunity of doing what has to be done at Calais, thinks he had better wait, but refers all to the King's pleasure. Wishes to know the King's resolution, that he may write to De Vaulx and the bishop of Bath. Will dispatch Mr. Comptroller before to take a view of Calais. Westminster, 21 June. Signed.

"Instruction et information des deux ambassadeurs depputez et ordonnez de par les Sieurs des Lignes, qui sont Lucerne et de Undlevalde, de ce quilz doivent parler et remonstrer aux capitaines et gens de guerre aux monstres de Fribourg et ailleurs ou elles se feront." To admonish the said captains to fear God, not to despise the Holy Mass and the Sacrament, and to keep the Christian ordinances about the forbidden days for eating flesh. To speak against blasphemous oaths, drinking customs, and the robbing of churches and priests' houses. To regard in everything the honor of God, his mother and the Saints; and everything to the contrary must be vigorously punished. The king [of France], according to the articles of the alliance, has demanded a levy of men, and will appoint Lautrec lieutenant-general for the war in Italy;—with which they are pleased, and they will make a levy diligently. The captains and men ought not to leave each other. The losses they have experienced in the late wars arise from their living without the fear of God, and from their bad faith to each other. They mention the excesses of the Spaniards and lansquenets at the taking of Rome, and exhort their comrades to obey their officers, and live in good faith and brotherly affection for each other. All who leave the service without permission from their captains ought to be severely punished. The musters must be held without fraud or deceit. They must stipulate with the French ambassadors for regular monthly payments, and for a proper complement of horse, artillery, and French foot.

I have received your letters giving news of the birth of a prince. The Venetians and duke Francesco have raised a fresh levy. The Duke is at Lodi. Pedro Navarro has arrived at Asti. I hear that Lautrec is coming with 800 lances. The Swiss have refused the application of the king of France. The 100,000 ducats sent by you to Genoa have been reduced to 53,000 by the debts of Bourbon. If more money do not arrive the Germans will not go hence for more than 15 or 20 days, and then they will return and hold this state in pledge. They give me a great deal of trouble. I did not concern myself about the matter as long as Bourbon lived. I send a list of officers. I have asked leave of absence on account of ill health. Milan, 22 June 1527.

Has received his letters of the 17th and 23rd. As to the visit of Francis to Picardy, cannot leave for [nine] or ten days, on account of a tertian fever; and when that is better, he must go to Paris, which will take 20 or 24 days at least. Wishes him to tell the King and Cardinal of this, that they may decide what is best. Is much vexed at not being able to make this journey, as messeigneurs De Bathe and De [Rochford] have seen. They came to see him this afternoon, and left him when the cold fit was coming on. De Vaux must tell Wolsey his state, and assure him that he will keep the appointment if he can. Will never be easy till he has seen the Cardinal and the king of England. He must thank Wolsey for his continual kind offices on Francis's behalf at the English court.

The power sent by Vaux "par vertu . . . ce que Monseigneur de Tarbe a traicté a es[to] . . . dernièrement faict, il a esté receu et mys es [mains] du Chancelier pour le garder avecques l . . ." Will inform him in . . . days how his health is. St. Denys, 23 June.

27 June. 3200. CAPTURE OF ROME.

R. O.

"Principium litterarum Sanguæ ad Nuncium in Anglia, ex trireme supra Portum Ficum, die 27 Junii."

Takes the first opportunity of informing him of what has occurred to him since that dreadful day. What Goths, what Vandals, what Turks were ever like this army of the Emperor in the sacrilege they have committed? Volumes would be required to describe but one of their misdeeds. They strewed on the ground the sacred body of Christ, took away the cup, and trod under foot the relics of the saints to spoil their ornaments. No church nor monastery was spared. They violated nuns, amid the cries of their mothers, burnt the most magnificent buildings, turned churches into stables, made use of crucifixes and other images as marks for their harquebusses. It is no longer Rome, but Rome's grave (non Urbs, sed bustum Urbis). They dressed the old wooden crucifix, revered by all nations, which stood on one of the seven altars of St. Peter's, in the uniform of a lanzknecht. St. Peter and St. Paul, who have lain so many years buried under the altar of St. Peter's, never suffered such indignities, even from those who made them martyrs. Does not ask redress for the Church's grievances, but only for the injuries done to his country. If the Emperor will persist in using such instruments, and God still favors him, will not say that he will deny his Faith, but must thank He intends to make us the better Christians by giving us princes without religion.

Were sent for by the Emperor on the 25th June, who said he had deferred calling on us, from being uncertain about the affairs of Italy. He had letters from the prince of Orange of the 14th May, stating that Bourbon came to Rome on the 5th, and on the 6th took the burgo, and was slain with about 4,000 Spaniards and many Germans. When they had won the burgo, they demanded of the Pope a lodging for the host, and, being put off, made bridges over the Tiber. That night they entered Rome, and slew all that resisted, and in the morning the city was spoiled, and some houses set on fire. The Pope had a parley with them, and agreed to give them 350,000 ducats, with other things; but as he put off the time in hope of the League coming on, they went out to meet the host of the League. The Emperor had no certainty of the Pope being taken, or the cardinals slain. The prince of Orange's letters were addressed, not to the Emperor, but to Moncada, who then left Naples, and came to Rome. Other news, received through Genoa and Sienna, he reported as uncertain, viz., that the Pope and certain cardinals were [in] his hands, and that the League was dissatisfied. After this he came to his excuse, avowing, with his hands often laid upon his breast, that these things were done not only without his commission but against his will, and to his great displeasure. He said that Bourbon was compelled to go to Rome because his army was bent upon it and lacked money. When asked, Why do you maintain an army you cannot pay? his defence is that he was constrained to it by the conduct of others, who would not allow him to have peace on reasonable conditions;—that he was so desirous of peace with the Pope, that, though the truce made by the Viceroy was not to his honor, he was willing to accede to it; and if the Pope and the Florentines would have given a sum of money they might have stopped the clamor of his army, "which only for hunger of money outraged and would go forward." He professed great sorrow for the atrocities committed, and the death of the Duke; but, most of all, that he had had so little regard to the Pope's person, and the honor of the Cardinals.

To satisfy him, we said that we would report this apology, assuring him that the King would defend his innocence as if he were his natural son. "To this last word he answered, 'Even so he may take me, and so is my trust.'" He assured us that the news he sent to the King had been misrepresented by Francis. Ave Maria, the Observant, has come. He dined with Lee, and told us he was sent to treat for peace. He is perplexed at the coming of the bishop of Turbes. It calls to Lee's mind the warning of De Pratt that Francis wishes to make a league with the Emperor against England. Dr. Jo. Bartholomæus has been shot in the arm. Valladolid, 27 June 1527. Not signed.

"Ex litteris Domini Gregorii die ultima Junii Venetiis datis."

Had written that he was going to Florence, and to take with him the uncle of the marquis of Saluzzo with a commission from the French king. Has done so, and encouraged the Florentines, who, as they seem to be suspected of wishing to negotiate with the Imperialists, confirmed the league with France, and determined on raising a good army with good captains. Went next to Bologna, which he found all topsy-turvy, preparing to send ambassadors, and submit to the Imperialists. Nevertheless, after much difficulty, by means of his friends and kinsmen of either faction, got 1000 foot enrolled to preserve the city for the Church. A considerable sum of money has also been raised at Venice to be sent to the Bolognese. Went next to Ferrara, and had much conference with the Duke on the affairs of Italy, warning him that he would share the common danger. At last he promised he would do nothing against Bologna, or any possessions of the Church, saying that he would be a good Italian, and that if the confederates carried on the war bravely he would join them, but he declined to make up for the cowardice of others. Found the Venetians most eager to help. They mean to increase their army to 10,000 foot. As they had heard that the duke of Urbino was going to return to his duchy, Casale proposed to them to elect the marquis of Mantua as their captain general, who was dissatisfied with the Imperialists, and would give great importance to the League. This counsel pleased the Doge, and, though arguments were used against it, they determined to discuss the matter among themselves. They mean to offer the free cardinals an asylum in Ravenna or Bologna, which the writer was commissioned by the Pope to procure for them. Here are cardinals Trani and Ægidius. The cardinal of Mantua, who is very powerful, is endeavoring to form a union for the protection of the Church; and unless the Cardinals, from fear, prefer Bologna or Ravenna, Parma will be offered to them, which is strong, and will be protected by two armies.

The Pope has sent hither Bartholomæus de Urbino, directing him to learn from the writer what provisions had been made, and to take measures accordingly; for he reports that the plague is very violent in Rome, and that the Pope was going to Gaeta, whither the Spaniards seem desirous to take him. Informed him of the great provisions made by France and England, urging him to encourage the Pope by no means to leave the castle, but to appoint officers outside for the business of distributing benefices. The Imperialists have compelled the Pope to pay them 50,000 ducats, so that he has been obliged to burn all the sacred vestments for the sake of the gold and silver which is woven into them. In the first consistory he has given the hat to the new cardinals, and restored cardinal Colonna. Cardinals Casarinus and Perusinus have fled from Rome. The Venetians have resolved to hire the services of count Gaizus and count Rangone. The Doge urges Casale to go into Lombardy, and report to them touching their army there. Is anxious, however, to be with the Legate shortly. If good captains be sent into Lombardy it should be conquered in ten days, for they are destitute of everything. Has heard of a new plot to obtain possession of Pavia.

After his last of the 27 June, heard from Almain that the Emperor has appointed the abbot of Bari and the count of Oropence to bring in these orators, out of respect to England; and he said, "If you denounce to us battle twenty times, yea, although you take all the towns in Flanders and come to Antwerp, yet we will not take you for our enemies, ne we woll ne can be yours. And, as I say, I do not doubt you shall perceive this is the Emperor's stomach." He asserted that the Emperor would do nothing for the French king, but be guided by the counsels of the Cardinal; that peace was now easier since the death of Bourbon, and the Emperor could do justice whilst he gratified the King. He will, however, have Sforza tried. He has sent to Ant. de Leiva, now governor of Milan, to demand if Sforza will stand a trial. If so, he shall choose his own judges. He implied that if Sforza was restored after being found guilty, it should be for the King's sake. He also insisted on the unfavorable answer given to Ave Maria, the Observant, the secret agent of the French king. He said the French king laid the blame on the Pope for the part he had taken in the league, and the Pope had absolved him from the treaty of Madrid; yet he is preparing an army for Italy, of which Lautrec shall be captain. He gave me news of Italy, and that the Pope should put himself in the hands of the Emperor, and come into Spain if the Emperor desired it, pay for his ransom 300,000 ducats, and surrender St. Angelo, Ostia, and other places; but the Almain would only accept ready money. He said that Bourbon had acted contrary to the Emperor's commission, who is very angry at the cruelties committed.

The Emperor is entering into a league with the emperor of Russia against the Turks. Don Ferdinand has reduced Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia to the See Apostolic. Francisco Negro, descended from the emperors of Constantinople, has done much hurt to the Turks, and taken many places out of their hands. He has proffered his services to Don Ferdinand. 3212. SPAKMAN v. WATSON.

R. O. A bill in Chancery. The petitioner, Julian wife of Nich. Spakman, sets forth that on the 19 Feb. 18 Hen. VIII. John Watson of London, brewer, assaulted Isabella his wife, and gave her three great wounds with a dagger, which brought on premature labor, and she was delivered of a dead child, which had a great wound in the left side; that the mother languished till the — June 19 Hen. VIII., when she died of her injuries; that Watson took sanctuary at Westminster; that inquests were taken both after the death of the child and of its mother, but, by the influence of Sir Hen. Wyat and other friends of Watson's, neither jury would bring in a verdict of murder; and that Watson, being now at large under surety, has commenced an action against Spakman and others for wrongfully entering his house and embezzling his goods. Prays that he be restrained from proceeding until the murder be inquired into before the Court of Chancery.

Draft, with numerous corrections in Cromwell's hand, pp. 3.

- R. O. 2. Inquest on the death of the child above mentioned, finding that it never had any life in it.
- R. O. 3. Inquest on the death of Isabella Watson, taken 3 June 19 Hen. VIII., before John Wilford, coroner, in London, and the sheriffs, finding that she had been cured of her wounds by surgical care, but died of an imposthume afterwards formed, on 2 June.
- R. O. 4. Inventory of part of the goods of John Watson, consisting of silver cups, drinking pots, rings, girdles, coral beads with "gaudeys," feather beds, coverlets, carpets, tablecloths, brass pans, gowns, kirtles, kerchiefs and money. Marginal notes are appended, showing that some of these articles are confessed, and some denied, by Spakman.
P. 1.
- R. O. 5. Inventory of part of the goods of John Watson's wife before her marriage.
P. 1.
- R. O. 6. Inventory of the goods of John Watson which came into the hands of Nich. Spakman after the former had murdered his wife; with memorandum that he licensed his wife upon her deathbed to dispose of her own goods as she thought fit, and give away 50*l.* of his money; yet he detains several parcels specified, and Spakman laid out 30*l.* of his own money in prosecuting him for murder.
Pp. 3.
- R. O. 7. "Parcels of goods, ready money, and plate of John Watson that Nicholas Spakman with other had and hath wrongfully."
Pp. 2.
- R. O. 8. "The very true parcels of all such plate and other goods as weren of Isabell late the wife of John Watson, which came unto [the hands*] house of Nycholas Spakeman."
P. 1. Endd.
- R. O. 9. "Here is the truth of the delivering of part of Watson's good, which he hath untruly surmised and troubled against Nicholas Spakeman, William Hethe and John Smyth for it;"—viz., that Watson's wife, after receiving her death wounds, fled to the house of Spakeman, who found her in a swoon when he came home,—as he thought, dead. Then hearing it said that Watson was in his house, and would hang himself, went thither and found a number of people. Some suggested to him to save some of the goods for the children, but he would not touch them. Afterwards some of Watson's own servants brought away some of the goods in three small chests for the use of his wife. Watson remained in sanctuary a month and more, then went to Sir Hen. Wyott, and told him his wife had a chest of his with 40*l.* in gold and certain writings, which he wished to have. Wyot accordingly bid Spakeman speak to his sister † to deliver it; which was done. Spakeman then desired Wyot, in my lord Broke's presence, "that he might be delivered of her," as he was at great costs with her. Was asked to keep her a month longer, and promised 10s. a week for doing so, Watson being allowed to visit her every day. On one of these visits he said to her, "Way is me for thee, that ever it lay in my wretched hand to do such a deed!" Three weeks before her death he said to her, "Isabel, ye have 100*l.* of yours and mine, the which I give you leave and desire you to give away 50*l.* for your soul's health and to your friends, and the other 50*l.* let it be kept for my children." He also gave her her raiments which he delivered to her with his own hands. Part of this she gave away. The rest is in her chamber.

3217. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

R. O.
St. P. t. 194.

Is not a little troubled at the message sent from the King by Master Welman, as if Wolsey questioned the King's secret matter. "There is nothing he is so desirous to advance, "not doubting for anything that I have heard so[ever] this overture hath come to the Queen's knowledge. than I have done before; and, as I said unto Master Sampson, if your brother had never known her, by reason whereof there was no affinity contracted, yet in that she was married in facie Ecclesie, and contracted per verba de presenti, there did arise impedimentum publicæ honestatis, which is no less impedimentum ad dirimendum matrimonium than affinity, whereof the bull maketh no express mention." These are the words Wolsey uttered to Sampson when he said that the Queen was very obstinate, "affirming that your brother did never know her carnally," and that she desired to have counsel as well of strangers as of English,—a device which never could have come into her head except it had been suggested; and therefore Wolsey suggested that the King should handle her gently, until it was shown what the Pope and Francis would do. Norfolk and Suffolk were present on the occasion. Begs the King will believe that in all things concerning the King's honor Wolsey will be constant, even if all others should fail. Begs credence for Wolman. Westminster, 1 July. Signed.

I have been in great agony about the contents of your letters, not knowing whether to construe them to my disadvantage "comme en des aucunes autres," or to my advantage. I beg to know expressly your intention touching the love between us. Necessity compels me to obtain this answer, having been more than a year wounded by the dart of love, and not yet sure whether I shall fail or find a place in your affection. This has prevented me naming you my mistress; for if you love me with no more than ordinary love, the name is not appropriate to you, for it denotes a singularity far from the common. But if it please you to do the office of a true, loyal mistress, and give yourself, body and heart, to me, who have been and mean to be your loyal servant, I promise you not only the name, but that I shall make you my sole mistress, remove all others from my affection, and serve you only. Give me a full answer on which I can rely; and if you do not like to answer by letter, appoint some place where I can have it by word of mouth.

I and my heart put ourselves in your hands. Let not absence lessen your affection; for it causes us more pain than I should ever have thought, reminding us of a point of astronomy that the longer the days are, the further off is the sun, and yet the heat is all the greater. So it is with our love, which keeps its fervour in absence, at least on our side. Prolonged absence would be intolerable, but for my firm hope in your indissoluble affection. Received your letter of the 27th ult. on the 21st June, and rode to the court at St. Denis. Sent your letter to the King by Robartet. Could not see the King, but spoke with my Lady after dinner. She desires you should not pass beyond Amiens, where her son will meet you, as he is now out of all danger from the fever. She thanks you heartily for the trouble you have taken. You will scarcely arrive at Amiens before the end of July.

She likes the overture to be made by the English and French ambassadors to the Emperor, for redress of the outrages done to the Pope. If it be refused there will be just cause for war. We showed Robartet the instructions written to the ambassadors in Spain. My Lady said, that Christian princes ought not to suffer Christ's vicar to remain in captivity, and ought to withdraw their obedience from a Pope who is a prisoner.

Hears from my lord of Richmond's council that after divers thieves of Scotland and traitors of Tynedale had been taken and committed to ward at Newcastle by Sir Will. Evres, sheriff of Northumb., Sir Will. Lisle and Humphrey his son broke out of prison there, set at liberty the English thieves, and went with them into Scotland. The Scotch thieves were sons to the headsmen of the Armstrongs, and have done most hurt of any in Hexhamshire and the bishopric of Durham. Feels that these two ungracious men will procure the thieves of both countries to do much hurt in Hexhamshire. Thinks the King's letters should be addressed to the king of Scots for their apprehension. Sir William is unfortunate, as Wolsey of late "was content he should be put at large upon good sureties," and sureties to the extent of 500*l.* were given for him. The forfeitures had better be applied to defraying the King's charges in those parts, and Lisle's lands given to those who will remain there. St. James's beside Westminster, Thursday, 3231. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

R. O.

St. P. i. 196.

Advertises the King of what occurred since taking his journey from Westminster on Wednesday last. Was everywhere well received by the people of London. Hears also from the archbishop of Canterbury and Sir Edward Gildeford, who resorted unto him, that the realm was never in better quiet, in spite of all reports to the contrary. Lodged on the first night of his journey at Sir John Wilteshere's, and was met by the Archbishop, with whom he communicated on the King's secret matter;—what had been done in it;—how displeasantly the Queen takes it;—what the King has done to pacify her,—declaring that hitherto nothing had been intended by the King, except to discover the truth, on occasion moved by the bishop of Tarbe.
 Watched his countenance, and observed his astonishment how the Queen should come to the knowledge of it. Thinks he is not much turned from his first fashion, as he asserts that, however unpleasant it may be to the Queen, truth and the law must prevail. I have instructed him how he is to act if the Queen should ask his counsel, and he has promised to comply. Spoke to him of the present calamities of the Church, the captivity of the Pope, and your resolutions for redress of the same, for which purpose I was sent to France.

Proceeded next to Rochester, where I arrived on Thursday, and was received by Sir Edward and Sir Henry Gildeford, and entertained by the

Bishop, to whom I talked of the lamentable state of the Church, and the prayers and fastings ordered by you for redress of the same. On my asking whether any one had been sent to him from the Queen, he paused awhile, and in conclusion said that he had received a message from the Queen by word of mouth, without any particulars, stating that certain matters had happened between her and you, in which she desired his counsel; that he had replied that in such matters he would do nothing without the King's commandment. On my asking him to be plain and frank with me, and tell me if he had formed any conjecture what the matter could be, he answered that he knew nothing certain, but conjectured it was for a divorce, and he was induced so to think by a tale brought by his brother from London, who had heard in certain company things sounded to such a purpose. This is all he says. I then told him that the King had never intended to disclose this matter, except to very few; yet now, seeing that his good intentions had been misrepresented, I had special commission to inform him of it, taking from him an oath of secrecy. I then told him the whole matter of the proposed marriage between Francis and the princess Mary, and the objection made by the bishop of Tarbe, and the investigations to which it had given rise, as to the dispensing powers of the Pope, &c., for which I was sent into France;—thus declaring the whole matter unto him as was devised with you at York Place. I added that some inkling of the matter had come to the Queen's knowledge, who, casting further doubts than was intended, had "broken with your Grace thereof after a very displeasing manner, saying, that by my procurement and setting forth a divorce was purposed between her and your Highness," and your anxiety to discover who was her informant. The Bishop greatly blamed the conduct of the Queen, and thought if he might speak with her he might bring her to submission. I have, however, so persuaded him that he shall not speak or do anything in this matter, except according to your pleasure. After this I had some conversation with him, urging the impediments of the marriage, in which he mainly agreed.

Between Sitenborne and Faversham I encountered the ambassador (Jerome à Lasco) from the Vayvoia, calling himself king of Hungary, imploring your aid against the Turk. He protested that his master was not seeking an alliance with the Turk, and that he had been promised assistance from the French king. The King may well refuse aid, and avoid the displeasure of Ferdinand, on the ground that he must look to the Church. The ambassador had thought of proposing an alliance with Madame Renée, but on seeing her had devised for a marriage with Madame Eleanor. Urged the dishonor of adhering to the Turk. He told me there was much disorder in the French king's council, who was destitute of good captains and money, and is in a perplexing and melancholy plight. Faversham, 5 July. Signed.

3232. [BISHOP FISHER] to PAUL ———.

R. O.

Paul says he has heard two things from Dancaester, at which he marvels not a little: 1, that Wakefeld has found something in Hebrew which makes for the King's argument; and 2, that the bishops who at first dissented have all come over to the King's opinion; which, if true, he thinks a great disgrace. Thanks him for this candid expression of opinion. The matter concerns not only the honor but the soul's health of the writer, if he were to recant what he had once said truly. Trusts he will never depart from the truth, though open to conviction. Has taken great pains in this matter to know what the truth is, and has no doubt of his conclusion. Gives his reasons for holding, in opposition to Wakefeld, that marriage with a deceased brother's wife was not prohibited by the Mosaic law. Believes the King means to do nothing against the law of God, but he will be quite justified in submitting his difficulties to the Pope; especially as kings, from the fulness

Sent a letter to the King yesterday, and a book written by the counsel of Master Wakfeld. Answers the objection of some of the King's counsel, that Leviticus is annulled by Deuteronomy. Wakfeld desires to know whether the King is willing to hear the truth in this great matter. He offers to "show unto your Highness such things as no man within your realm can attain unto or show the like, and as well for you as against you." But he does not meddle in this matter without your licence. Pace commends him for his excellent learning and wonderful knowledge. Sends a Hebrew alphabet, desiring it may be delivered to Master Fox with order to get it by heart; by so doing he shall in one month be able to judge of the correctness of the Vulgate and the LXX., and to show the King the truth. "De præsentis statu serenissimi principis domini Joannis regis Hungariae, etc., et de his qui sunt ei nunc obediētes et qui non."

All Hungary, with that part of Dalmatia and Croatia which his predecessors possessed, Slavonia, Transylvania, Walachia Major or Moldavia, Walachia Minor or Transalpinia, are completely in his power, and obedient to him, with all the barons and prelates;—except Stephen de Bathori, formerly the Palatine, and now proscribed in a general diet; Thomas de Zalahaza, elect bishop of Wesprim; Alexis Thwrae, of Bethlenfalwa, of the Company of the Fucars, who was made a baron two or three years ago by the favor of a bishop whose daughter he married; and certain young men, servants of the Queen, who are not barons. The Bishop and Thwrae were deputed to guard the Queen when king Lewis set out, and they alone were present at Ferdinand's election. John count of Corbavia is said to have received a pension from Ferdinand, but would not be present at the election, and has not yet offered obedience to him as king of Hungary. Others who were with Ferdinand, Francis Batthyany, Stephen Broderich, bishop of Sirmisch, king Lewis' chancellor, John Thahy, governor of the priory of Wraza (Auranes), returned when they saw that the whole kingdom, except the three mentioned, chose the present king. A few days ago, three young men, Despotus Rascie, Ladislaus More, and Valentinus Turcus, went over to Ferdinand. A rebel, named Niger, of the Rascian family, was corrupted by Ferdinand, but his army was destroyed by the bishop of Waradin. It is thought the three young men will return when they hear this. No other counts or nobles have revolted from the King. Presbourg and Oldenburg have been given up by Bathor to Ferdinand, except the castle of Presbourg, which is held by John Bornemyza. There are other forts and towns belonging to the Queen, which the King could have occupied, but he has acted throughout from a wish to preserve peace.

Although in the late disaster, king Lewis, the brother of the present king, and a great number of prelates, barons, &c., were killed, the kingdom will soon be in its former condition. Two thirds of the kingdom are untouched, and the people of the part wasted are safe. Slavonia, Transylvania, and both Walachias are unhurt. To the French king's question, whether men or money are most needed, the most salutary thing for Christendom and for Hungary would be for Francis to turn all his forces against the enemy of Christendom, as he offered to the bishop of Sirmisch, king Lewis's ambassador; but if he cannot do that, money would be of the greatest use, as guns and arms were lost in great quantities in the battle. The king of Poland is devoted to the king of Hungary, as Francis will hear from his ambassador, who is returning. The Bohemians and Slesians have repented a thousand times accepting Ferdinand, and will not assist him against Hungary. The Moravians will give him 2,000 foot, for which the King will shortly punish them. The dukes of Bavaria and other princes of the Empire are allies of the King. Sends letters intercepted from Ferdinand to Mahmethbagh, governor of Nadoralba, or Belgrade, to excite the Turks against the King. Valentinus Thurcius has returned, and Ladislaus More has promised not to bear arms against the King.

Sends letters he has received from the bishop of Bath and Sir Anthony Browne. Francis is rid of his fever, and will meet Wolsey at Amiens. Is glad that the declaration of the Pope's obedience has been made to the English ambassadors in France. Sends news from Gregory Casale, translated from Italian into Latin, stating that the Pope refuses to give up Parma and Placentia, and that the Germans and Swiss in Rome are suffering from pestilence. It is thought that the duke of Ferrara will join the League, and the Florentines will do the same. Is told by the Pope's ambassador that the Cardinals will be induced to come to France. Hopes the Pope will soon be delivered, and God will "send unto your Highness your most noble and virtuous desires." Canterbury, this Monday, 8 July.

P.S.—Has received with the bishop of Bath's letters duplicates from the ambassadors in Spain of the 28th and 31st May, also from Worcester and Lee of the 15th June. The bishop of Tarbes had not then arrived at Bayonne. Has been advertised by his chancellor of Durham of the heinous attempts of Sir John [William] Lisle and his son, who have broken prison at Newcastle. Lisle has thus forfeited his bond and his lands. Recommends that Sir William Parr have the lands, and that the king of Scots be written to not to give him shelter. Signed.

Arrived here, at Canterbury, on Saturday last, on his way to the French king. Will proceed tomorrow to Dover, and cross on Wednesday, if the wind serves, to Calais, where he will have to wait seven or eight days for the transport of his train, which numbers 1,000 horses. Will then go towards Amiens, where, as they write from Paris on the 2nd inst., the French king intends to meet him. Proposes to be there on the 26th inst. Desires them to congratulate the King on his recovery, and to thank him for coming to Amiens to shorten Wolsey's journey. Would be content to travel farther rather than he should suffer in his body or hinder his affairs. Is very glad of the overture made by the King's mother for a meeting of the Cardinals who are at liberty, to consult about the ordering of the Church during the Pope's captivity, and of her saying that Christian princes could not with honor allow the Head of the Church to be kept in servitude; and that there could be no cause for any prince to put the Pope to ransom, or hold him in durance, but all Christian princes ought to decline from his jurisdiction till he is at liberty, so that every man may have access to him. If she had not made this overture, the King and he would undoubtedly have done so. Desires them to tell her his approval of it, and to ask her to cause her son to summon French and Italian cardinals to meet at some place in France, near the King and himself, that they and the Regent may confer with them concerning the government of the Church during the Pope's captivity, and consider what is to be done if the Emperor will not condescend to reasonable conditions of peace. They must insist that the Cardinals should meet at some place as near as possible, that Wolsey may not have to go to the other end of France, and to save time.

The papal ambassador, who is with Wolsey, writes about this to the Legate de Salviatis and the absent Cardinals; and the King and Wolsey will do the same, according to the enclosed minute, which is to be shown to Francis and his council.

They must suggest to the King that as Wolsey's journey has come to lady Margaret's ears, certain passages between Amiens and Calais should be protected by the garrisons on the frontiers, lest any enterprise be attempted against him from Flanders. They must also ask the King to send persons to Calais to tell him where his train shall be lodged. The bp. of Bath can then come to him with all speed, leaving Browne behind. Would like to meet him at Montreuil, or at furthest Abbeville. Will send to Browne from Calais the number of his train to be shown to the French king, whom they must desire to take order for forwarding the King's letters to Spain, Italy, and other parts.

I have received your letters dated Canterbury, the 8th, and delivered the one intended for the King. As the King had labored that day from Windsor to the More, he deferred hearing the other letters of my lord of Worcester and Gregory Cassilis till next day. He desires you to request the French king to command Lautrec to advance, and revenge the Pope. Three days before the King left Windsor he sent letters to the king of Scots for the apprehension of Sir William Lisle, his son Humphrey, and others. He has also written to the earl of Angus.

The King is informed that William Steward, a servant of the French king, has lately arrived in Scotland with letters to the Scotch king, to whom he brings horses, and swords from Albany, and he has hired masons to repair the castle of Dunbar. The King is exceedingly sorry to hear of Duke's grievous sickness. At the More, 10 July.

No one can receive the news of the disaster at Rome without grief and indignation. What could be more nefarious among Christians than to conspire the destruction of that city, and to treat with contumely the Vicar of Christ. They have not even spared holy places, but have imprisoned the Pope, and committed all kinds of sacrilege. As a champion of the Faith, is determined to resist this storm, and leave nothing undone to restore the Pope to liberty, and vindicate the dignity of the Church. Has no doubt the Cardinal, and those of his brethren who have been spared this degrading bondage, burn with the same zeal. Has accordingly despatched the cardinal of York to the French king, to consult upon this matter. Hopes Cibo will meet him, and take measures for the Pope's liberation. Since Brooke left, has written twice, from in Moravia, dated April 26, and from Pr[essell] in Slesia, dated May 20, and has sent letters to the King and Wolsey from the king of Poland. The king of Bohemia sent on the 8th inst. the marquis Casimirus of Brandenburg with 12,000 foot and 6,000 horse, who have laid siege to Teben Castle on the Danube, eight leagues from Vienna. The King will shortly follow with more forces. He waits here expecting the delivery of the Queen.

The queen of Hungary has come from Presburg to Vienna. The castle of Presburg is not yet given up, but probably will be on the arrival of the army. Yesterday one of the captains of the castle was with the King at Vienna. Does not think other fortresses will be so lightly given up, for the Wawels makes great preparation to defend his towns and castles, and has determined to keep the crown. At the visitation of Our Lady he had a solemn mass sung at Oven (Buda), where were present Papal, French and Venetian ambassadors. After mass the confederation between him, France and Venice was read. It is reported that the king of England was comprehended. The black man of whom he wrote remains with his 16,000 men. It is doubtful whose part he will take, but he has sent an ambassador to the king of Bohemia.

11 July. 3258. TOWNS OF SHREWSBURY.

R. O.

Depositions on behalf of the town of Shrewsbury in a cause between them and the Abbot, taken 11 July 19 Hen. VIII.

John Gethens says (1) he has been thrice bailiff of the town, twice common serjeant, and is now crowner: that 37 or 38 years ago there stood upon a bridge called Stanbrugges, outside Shrewsbury, and at the end of the bridge next the Abbey, "as much within that end of the bridge as the length of the table in the inner chamber of the Star Chamber at thrice or thereabout," which was the boundary of the Abbey's franchise, the rest of the bridge and all the housing between the Cross and the town belonging to the franchise of the town. (2.) The Cross was borne away by parcels, by whom precisely he cannot say, though many think by the Abbot's command. (3.) He has known of no variance between the town and the Abbot till now; but he has known "dayyngs upon claims of that franchise made by divers abbots," between them and the town. Meryvale and the stone bridge to the place where the Cross stood are within the town franchise, and when he was serjeant he took distresses there.

Will. Pontesberie says (1) he saw the Cross 50 years ago stand 17 or 18 yards within the end of the bridge; (3) that he knew variance between the town and Abbot 69 years ago, when Ric. Hoord was bailiff; and generally confirms previous deponent.

The interrogatories are nine in number.

The troublous time at Rome keeps from us the answer of the letters we sent from the Emperor touching your pension on Toledo. The Archbishop will pay nothing. Has not heard whether he has. Is glad Wolsey is satisfied with his explanation about the exchange. In the letters they were shown by Buclans in cipher, it was expressed that the French king intended to offer you the papality or patriarchate of France, as the French would no longer obey the Church of Rome. Buclans said to me, My lord Cardinal much desired to have "the legacy per inferiorem Germaniam." If he will have it now, or the patriarchate, I doubt not he shall have it. I refused to report this, saying you would little esteem that thing. The Emperor's ambassador in France has written to know how he is to behave to your Grace. On the 10th received your packet, with a letter for the King's highness, which I delivered at the More. Received another packet on the 14th, with a letter for the King, which I delivered at Enfield. De Lasko, the Hungarian ambassador, delivered his charge this day, dilating on the miserable state of Hungary, and the free election of the Vavoda. The King ordered the dean of his chapel (Sampson) to reply. Gives the substance of the speech. The ambassador had his brother Stanyslaus with him. The King ordered me to send this account to you.

Francoise Philip, the Spaniard, sewer to the Queen, has labored to obtain licence to go into Spain to visit his mother, who is sick. The Queen has refused her assent, and labored with the King to prevent it, but the King, "knowing great collusion and dissimulation between them, doth also dissemble; feigning that Philip's desire is made upon ground and consideration, and easily hath persuaded the Queen to be content with his going. And because it was thought dangerous for him to pass through France, or, at this season, by the seas, the King hath said, that in case Philip be taken by enemies his Highness will redeem him, and pay his ransom; and thus policy the King useth to bring Philip in more firm confidence; but his pleasure is, and also he desireth and prayeth your Grace to use such policy as, notwithstanding any safe-conduct that the said Philip shall obtain, either by your Grace's means, or any other, of the French king, he may be let, impeached, and detained in some quarter of France, so that it be not in anywise known that the said let, arrest, or apprehension should come by the King, by your Grace, or any of the King's subjects. The King's highness doth perceive that the Queen is the only cause of the man's going into Spain, as he that is and hath been always privy unto the Queen's affairs and secrets." Articles objected to Abraham Water, Dutchman (Tutonicus), by Geoffrey Wharton, vicar-general of Cuthbert bishop of London, now abroad, and chief official of the consistory of the see of London.

1. That he was baptized in the Catholic faith, which he has observed after arriving at years of discretion. 2. That he belongs to the parish of St. Botolph, Colchester, and is under the jurisdiction of the bishop of London. 3. That he knows or believes that all Christians who believe or affirm about the sacraments of the Church otherwise than the Catholic Church teaches, are heretics, and deserve to be canonically punished. 4. That in April, May, or June of the present year, 1527, in St. [Botolph's] or other parishes of Colchester, he asserted and publicly preached that he could make of a piece of bread the body of Almighty God, as well as the best priest of them all, contrary to the decision of the Church, imperilling his soul, and showing an evil example to others. 5. De Tarbes and Poyntz arrived on the 1st, and were well received by the Emperor, who gave them a ready answer, "sometimes smiling and jesting with M. de Tarbes." He declared himself inclined to peace, and spoke well of the king of England, and of Wolsey. The conditions proposed are 2,000,000 g.e., the surrender of the superiority of Artois, &c., a pension on Milan during the life of Francis Sforza, &c. We are told by Allemand that the King has already demanded of Sforza whether he will take his trial. He says the settlement is easier now Bourbon is dead. De Tarbes will not make any further offers, and the Emperor complains that better ones have been proposed. Various instructions to this effect were produced. We have so handled matters that the Emperor will propose to us his own demands, and refer them to you. We trust for a time the intimation of war is past. Detail further conversation about Milan, and the propositions of De Tarbes. Spoke to the Emperor upon the cruelties committed at Rome, and begged he would set the Pope at liberty. He said he did not know in what condition the Pope was; and if he is a prisoner at St. Angelo, he is kept there by the unruliness of the soldiers, who will not obey their captains. He professed himself a devout child of the Church, and doubted not that he should satisfy the Pope, who was coming to Spain.

He has told his ministers that if he be brought to any unreasonable conditions it should be out of regard to the King. Allemand stated that if the King wished the daughter of Portugal for the duke of Richmond she should have 400,000 ducats. It is said the King of Hungary and the Waywda are agreed. Valladolid, — July.

Before I could despatch these letters we have received the Emperor's demands, which "be great and fat," as the Emperor said they should be; but Allemand tells us, in the letter sent to his ambassador in England, your Highness shall know his secret intentions. De Verie has been sent to the Pope. The General of the Observants has arrived, with commission to treat between the Pope and the Emperor. Ave Maria confessed to me that Francis has given them a joint commission. The secretary tells me that the duke of Milan is not worthy to have the dukedom, as he will render it to France, and it is better that it should be given to you, with the daughter of Portugal. Valladolid, 17 July 1527.

B. M.

On the 2nd July, the day after the arrival of De Tarbes and Poynes, we went to the court, according to our instructions. The Emperor was glad to hear of Sir Francis's arrival, and affirmed that he could not believe there could be any "earnest stomach" between himself and the King. On our protesting the King's good will he said he did not doubt it, but he feared the French would ask much and give little, and he had already been deceived by them. We replied he might be assured that the King would provide against this. In the end he requested to be informed whenever we desired audience, and he would be ready.

After arranging with the French ambassadors, went to court with them, 4 July. Were admitted first to the Emperor's privy chamber, the French remaining in an outer chamber. Poyntz delivered first the King's letters, then the Queen's, and lastly Wolsey's, which he took most thankfully, and used all arguments to induce him to agree to the King's request. He answered, as before, that he desired nothing more than peace, if the conditions were reasonable. On this, at our request, the French ambassadors were admitted, and the bp. of Tarbes, after presenting letters from the French king and his mother, declared how the former, at the King's mediation, had strained himself to more large conditions of peace than hitherto, viz., 1, to give 2,000,000 cr. after the tenor of our instruction, i.e. the pledges to be delivered on payment of the first million, and the second to be paid in three years, sureties being given for it; 2, Francis to waive his claim to Naples and the pension during the Emperor's life; 3, touching the superiority of Artois and Flanders; 4, Sforza to hold the dukedom of Milan for life, paying the Emperor a pension; 5, the Emperor still to hold Tournay, and Francis Hôdin, or vice versa. We urged the Emperor to accept these terms, and that in consideration of the large loans made to him by the King, repayment of which has been so many years overdue, the Emperor would show his gratitude by paying the whole out of the first million.

The Emperor answered the French that more than 2,000,000 had been offered him before, that the King his uncle might be satisfied of his indemnity, that Francis had already given up his title of Naples to Mons. Valdemont, that as to Milan, after the trial whether Sforza had done wrong, then, &c. (here he stopped, leaving the rest to be inferred); that peace should be perpetual, and not only for a time (apparently referring to the conditions about Flanders, &c.), and that he did not consider Tournay and Hôdin should be any obstacle. A conversation ensued, in which the Emperor, "all lowering and heavy countenance set apart, was content sometime to jest with Mons. de Tarbes, and with sometime smiling, sometime laughing, to intermingle weighty and serious words, not without sting, and yet with all gentleness and propension to give good audience." De Tarbes said the French had never before offered the Emperor more than 1½ million; but the Emperor said they had twice offered him two, first by the Viceroy, and again by another. In the end he said he would appoint commissioners to confer with us.

Were not called on the 4th, 5th, or 6th. On the 6th Lee went to John Almain to desire audience next day; on which he said he and De Pratt were commissioned to confer with the English ambassadors apart from the French. Told this to the French, and asked their opinion, when they agreed that we should hear the commissioners, but not treat without them. Were put off by Almain that day, "because there was great triumph and jingo de canes for the Empress' first issuing out of the palace after her deliverance." Sent, at night, to appoint an hour next day, and arranged for three p.m., but afterwards Almain sent word that he would be engaged by the Emperor reading letters from Italy. Offered to come at any hour later, but were put off till next day, 9 July, when De Pratt said the Emperor could not but think we had larger offers to propose than those made by the French, and was determined to do nothing without the King's mediation. Answered that the King and Wolsey thought those offers sufficient, and that the French king could not have been induced to make them without Henry's mediation. De Pratt said Francis had made better offers by others, even by a secretary named Comacre sent to Granada. Told them the French denied this.

This was on the 9th July. Received that night Wolsey's letters of the 27th June, instructing us what to say to the Emperor about the conduct of his people at Rome, and the Pope's captivity, with other matters "for the ensarching of his purpose." Talked over the matter with the French ambassadors, and then spoke to the Emperor, who expressed himself sorry for what had taken place at Rome, but said the Pope was not a prisoner, he was only compelled to remain in St. Angelo, seeing the want of discipline among the soldiers, and that he himself would declare to all the world that he is a Christian prince, and most humble child of the Church. We all thought he said this very heartily. Even the Nuncio, with whom we spoke before seeing him, is convinced of the Emperor's good faith. He has countermanded all the triumphs that were preparing, "as castles to be besieged, and other things," in consequence of this news. At this interview brought the mandata, which the Emperor wished to see. De Tarbes said he hoped to see a good knot between the Emperor, the King, and his master. The Emperor answered "Yea, we three shall agree well enough, but (smiling) he feared that two should not," meaning that the King was needed as mediator. On this Ghinucci desired, if that were his mind, that he would instruct those who treated with us to be more open, and descend to specialties; which they declined, saying the conditions were not honorable. The Emperor replied, "They say truly." Desired to be told why, that they might see to it in their negotiations. He ordered the proxies to be delivered to Buclans.

The Emperor sent to us that night De Pratt and Buclans to excuse their having received our proxy, whom they regarded as mediators. As to our commission about the debts, he said he had sent one to Don Inigo to arrange the matter, but could talk with us about it when we would. Had a long conference with the Council next morning, in presence of the French ambassadors, who denied the French king's offers, or that they were instructed to offer any other conditions. The Council asked what conditions the French objected to as impossible; on which the latter "did somehow tarry;" and we, by consent of the bishop of Tarbes, went apart to the Emperor's confessor, desiring him to give us some light how we might set forward this peace. Were afterwards sent for by the Emperor, who disclosed to us his mind "right familiarly," saying he would try again if De Tarbes would not offer larger conditions. He complained that the French pretended certain articles in the treaty of Madrid were impossible, but would not say what they were, and insinuated that he would "utter conditions that should be fat enough," i.e., "ask more than he would at length covet to have," but the King and Wolsey would moderate them. He desired of us that no prejudice might be done to the treaty of Madrid, and that we would write to the King and you to handle this matter so that it may appear you did not make these offers of yourselves.

Praised his purpose, and thanked him for his towardness. Dissuaded his trying the bishop of Tarbes again as useless, and he gave it up. He said the French king would never sit still till his feathers were pulled, and talked about his having Burgundy, and the King Boulogne. Advised him to mitigate his demands for the good of Christendom. He took all in good part, and said, if he consented to unreasonable things, it would be for the sake of the King and Wolsey. He said he would now "conclude all things by his will with the French king, that no matter of any war hereafter should remain." What he meant, we suppose, we shall see by the conditions. He talked of Lautree's going to Italy, saying, he supposed the French believed his army to be destroyed. He said he had no certain news from Rome, but the captains seemed to be in the hands of the soldiers, and he feared he should be unable to enforce discipline if he were there himself.

Forgot to mention that Buclans showed us certain proxies and seals, among which was the authority of the lady Regent when Francis went to Italy, and the confirmation of the treaty of Madrid by the Parliament of Paris; a letter of which the news is contained in ciphers (see next No.); also the letter written by the Viceroy which Mons. de Tarbes confessed, in which he said he was commissioned by Francis and Madame to offer the Emperor 2,000,000 er., &c. This was on the 12th July.

Looked at Tarbes' instructions. "The 1st comprised the proposition, somewhat biting, albeit moderated at our exhortation;" the 2nd only the intimation; the 3rd referred him to us about payment of the millions, and committed the matters of Italy and Flanders to his discretion. The other articles only declared the impossibility and unreasonableness of the treaty of Madrid.

Some of the Emperor's council say the French should pay the whole indemnity, as Francis has bound himself to pay Henry all arrears. Leave this matter to be treated in England; otherwise, desire instructions. John Almain considers that of 40,000 marks 30,000 were due by Francis in arrears to the King, and 10,000 to the French queen.

* Were sent for to court on the 15th July, by De Pratt and Buclans, who told us the Emperor would give answer to De Tarbes, offering to discuss the articles of the treaty of Madrid, which they declared impossible to be observed, after which he would show his demands to us apart, and make them no further answer. To prevent this, spoke to De Tarbes, who agreed to let them go first to court, and wait till he was sent for. Told the Council that as we and the French were in one commission, it did not seem "convenient" to speak to De Tarbes first, and then deliver the demands to us apart, especially as they must at length know them. Were referred to the Emperor, to whom they made the same objections. He said the French offers did not deserve an answer, but at the King's mediation he intended to tell them, "Show me wherein the treaty may be reformed, and keep the rest," after which he meant to show us his demands. We said we had no commission to treat on any new basis, and begged him to moderate his demands. He said we should see them. We requested that De Tarbes might see them also. He said we might show them to him as of ourselves. Perceive the French would not have brought him to show any demands. He professes willingness to do everything for the King, and we avoid giving him any token but that the King and your Grace are still wholly his.

Immediately after we left the Emperor he sent De Buclans to us with his demands in writing, which we found fat enough. To moderate them, we shall make suit to come to his presence and endeavor to send you them reformed by this post. Wolsey will understand this is but the common course, the first demands being beyond the demandant's expectations, and John Almain says the Emperor will not disclose his secret mind to any but the King and Wolsey.

The Emperor despatches Mons. de Verie, who is called his minion, to the Pope. It is thought the general of the Observants who came yesterday has a large commission to treat with the Emperor for the Pope.

Remonstrated with De Buclans next day against the protestation of the continuance of the treaty of Madrid, their demands about Sforza, and the payment of the Emperor's debts to the King by Francis, &c. Buclans asked if they restored Storta, what security they should have that he would not give up the duchy to France, and suggested that the Emperor might give it along with the daughter of Portugal to the duke of Richmond. He also desired them on the Emperor's behalf, that as the King had entered into new amity with France, he could do the like with him. Assured him the Emperor might rely fully on the King.

De Tarbes has now shown us the fourth instruction. Perceive well why he withheld it; for he is to say to the Emperor, before the English ambassadors, that they desire his amity more than that of any other prince. 17 July 1527. Signed.

Wrote in former letters of the arrival of Ave Maria with a commission from Francis to treat with the Emperor for deliverance of the pledges and for peace. De Tarbes, on his arrival, rebuked him for calling himself the French king's commissioner, and made him explain to me (Lee) that he had no other commission than to treat of peace. This has increased my suspicion that he has a joint commission with the general of the Observants, who would have been here before, but that he was taken at sea by the Turks. Hears that they were commissioned to refer matters either wholly to the duke of Savoy, or to him and the King. Thinks it right to repeat all he hears, and let Wolsey judge its truth. I think the French are not sincere with us. They show us but three instructions. Poyntz saw four; and they admit they have a fourth. It is true the like may be said of us, but our secret instructions do not greatly differ from the first. De Tarbes admits his secret commission refers to the superiority of Flanders and the titles of Naples and Milan, &c. De Tarbes has said that he durst [not] visit Madame Eleanor, for fear of us, yet he confesses to have been with her without our knowledge. De Buklaus says he was with her three times, always at 10 o'clock p.m.

* In the night the Emperor sent to us Mons. de Buclans with the letters which were sent him by his ambassador in France, stating that he had been told by the bishop of Burgesse and Robertet that De Tarbes was commissioned to offer the conditions sent by the Viceroy without diminution, and, if the Emperor was not satisfied, to ask what he would demand; also that Lautrec, who was now gone to Italy, had full authority to conclude with the Viceroy, though Buclans says the Viceroy has no commission, except about matters of Italy; that Wolsey had pressed Francis to marry the Princess, and treat with us absolutely; and that Francis would fain know what speed De Tarbes made here before he proceeded to any further resolution with the Englishmen; "for they can no longer delay it."

De Buclans says the Emperor desires to have everything done there (in England), and that they are on the point of offering the daughter of Portugal for the duke of Richmond, with 400,000 ducats for her portion. She is the daughter of the eldest daughter.

He said he thought the Pope would be in Spain sooner than we expect. Signed.

The French ambassadors may have learned the Emperor's desire for peace by their two interviews with his Majesty, and two subsequent communications with his Council. They have been asked if they had no other charge except what they declared at their first coming hither, which they say they have not; and as the Emperor considers their offers unreasonable, and contrary to the treaty of Madrid, he is willing, if they will point out anything in that treaty which it is impossible for Francis to fulfil, to accept any reasonable modification offered by Francis, especially at the intercession of the king of England. On receiving this answer the French insisted that it should be given to them conjointly with the ambassadors of England; to which he also consents, out of regard for the king of England. The English ambassadors have also desired an answer concerning the sums due to the King their master; and although this has been given to them already, his Majesty replies again that he will never refuse to pay it.

R. O. ii. Copy of the writing delivered first to the English ambassadors, and Sym. xiv. 300. afterwards to those of France.

As the king of England is endeavoring to establish peace, the Emperor desires the English ambassadors to be informed:—1, that he has no intention by this writing to make an innovation in the oath and treaty of the king of France; but, for the sake of Christendom, although the offers of Francis are very insufficient, and give no assurance that treaties will be better observed in future than hitherto, he is willing to yield a little of his rights, if Francis will make the same offers that he made to the Viceroy; viz., that he and his mother will fulfil the treaty of Madrid, provided the Emperor will leave the duke at Milan; that they will pay the Emperor 2,000,000 for Burgundy in two instalments, the first in ready money when the Queen shall be delivered to him, the rest on a day to be determined, when his children shall be restored; or, if the Emperor prefer it, that the whole sum be paid at once, the Queen and children being given up at the same time; that Francis pay the Emperor's debt to England; that Francis should desire the Emperor to appoint a sum for the marriage of the Queen, and that he would increase the aforesaid sums by so much as he should take in pay, so that the sum for the marriage should cost the Emperor nothing. These terms the Emperor is willing to listen to for the sake of the king of England, subject to eight explanatory conditions. He also desires recompence for the expence he has incurred since the treaty of Madrid in defending himself against the Leagues.

The Emperor has full trust that the King and Wolsey will ameliorate the above conditions with due regard to his right. Valladolid, 20 July 1527.

B. M.

Have informed him of all occurrences since the arrival of De Tartes and Sir Fms. Poyntz to the 17 July, at 8 a.m. Were with the Emperor that day at 11, and said, though we had no doubt Mons. de Buclans had reported our judgment in his demands, we thought proper to declare it to himself. The Emperor said he was still determined to do justice towards Sforza, that it was intolerable for a subject to rebel with impunity, and that he knew this intercession for him was prompted by the French king, to whom Sforza would resign the dukedom. We said we had no commission to uphold his innocence, but hoped, even if he were in fault, the Emperor would restore him for the King's sake, and for the public weal, as the King had "conditioned" with Francis for Bourbon, and with the Pope for card. Colonna. The Emperor said Bourbon's case was very different from that of Sforza, whom he himself had made duke. Told him Francis could not meet his demand for ready payment of the 2,000,000; on which he said the pledges should remain in his hands till it was paid. Urged him not to hinder peace by their detention in the present state of Christendom, as he might have other sureties of his own subjects. He answered that as he distrusted the French king he would not undo his own subjects for his sake. Had a long discussion with him on these points, but could not move him. Expressed next our surprise that he expected the King to bind himself to protect the League at his own cost. He said he had seen this clause in treaties; but we reminded him that the King was not a contrahent, but only mediator. Here he told us that a friar had offered him 3,000,000 on the French king's behalf. "He meant Ave Maria; but the said Ave Maria, afterward examined, said that he offered but 1,000,000 in the presence of us. It may be, he denied it because the orators of France were present."

When they finally urged him "to condescend to possible and honest conditions," he said, "I think I have so done; and yet if anything be too much, I have given a clause in the latter end of the articles whereby my uncle and my lord Cardinal may reform, if anything otherwise be than shall be seen to them reasonable." Pressed him to show his resolute mind on each article, else the treaties could not take effect; "and moreover, we said to him, that as yet hitherto we perceive not what he doeth at the King's instance." He said he had given up his demand of Burgundy, and not insisted on the treaty of Madrid. Begged him to write to the King and Wolsey the terms which he thought would satisfy them, that they might see he was open to reason.

Spoke of the difficulty of the article binding Francis to give the Emperor an aid for his journey to Italy; to which he said little. Speaking of Milan, the Emperor said the great sticking was only for Milan, "and that he would write his resolute mind therein to his ambassador there;"—words which neither Worcester nor Poyntz took note of, but which Lee marked particularly as corresponding with the communication between himself and De Buclans, reported in our common letters of the 17th July. On our requesting that the French ambassadors should also have answer, he promised it next day. By arrangement with Worcester and Poyntz, Lee went that night to Buclans, and said, among other things, that he thought things went rather backward than forward, though we had done our best to keep things straight, and urged him to get the Emperor to despatch his full mind and instructions to England without more delay. He said he thought the Emperor had done much in having opened his mouth and made demand, to which the French king could never have brought him. He had also renounced Burgundy for the King's sake, and would renounce the treaty of Madrid if the peace took effect. "And what think you," he added, "by that I moved yesterday to you of Milan? Is that nothing? I assure you I told the Emperor thereof as of my own head, and he well allowed me, taking it for thing well devised; yea, and I will move all the Council thereon, for it must be; it cannot be so well bestowed. We know well you will keep it well enough from the Frenchmen." Doubtless he would not have proposed this, without consultation beforehand. Finally, he said he was commissioned to tell the English ambassadors next day that the Emperor desired them to press him no further "to open the specialties of his mind," but that he would send "this that he hath given," and hoped the King and Wolsey would be satisfied. The answer he would give to the French was, that their offers were too slender, and that if they would declare one by one the articles in which it was impossible to perform the treaty of Madrid, they would be reformed or changed. Leo said he wondered they would drive the time, and feared they would put everything in danger. Advised that the answer given to the French should be the same given to us, and not what they proposed. On this he promised to speak to the Emperor.

Next day, 18 July, he came to us, "and showed us in effect as before;" when we made replies such as Leo had made. Went to court with the French ambassadors, when, in Nassau's chamber, the Council read the answer to the French ambassadors, which was the general answer before mentioned, "and thereunto put, as in few so insufficient words, that the Emperor had declared his mind further in articles delivered to the ambassadors of England, which he thought much reasonable; and this was all." Hereupon De Tarbes, as agreed in such case, demanded that a common answer should be made to them and the English jointly, as they had taken counsel together all along; which we avowed. The Council, after consulting apart, said that the Emperor was asleep, but they would ascertain his pleasure when he rose. After a good deal of discussion together and apart, they promised to let us know when we should have answer.

Were not sent for that day. Next day, 19 July, Buclans came and said the Emperor would, at the request of the King's ambassadors, give the French the same answer as we had, "after and above the general answer;" and that the Emperor had sent him to ask whether it should be delivered to them apart, to us for them, or to us jointly; and again, whether to us as mediator, and to them as parties, or to both as parties. We said, though we had used mediation in the hope of full resolution at this time, we must now have answer in common. Advised that they should send this new answer in writing to the French ambassadors; but he said they would not do them that honor. Sent it, therefore, ourselves, thinking it best to know their objections beforehand. Report further conversation with Buclans. Leo, finally, to ascertain if the Emperor was writing his mind about Milan, asked him apart if his Majesty would now write to the King, Wolsey, and Don Inigo. He said Yes, to all. "I then said to him, what shall the King's highness and my lord Cardinal's grace say or think that by my letters afore hath understood how hot you were, and now so cold. Afore you would have sent, yea, and moreover you said did send, all resolution without consult; and now so gently required and so softly handled, you send no resolution but these general demands." He said if the King wished to see what he could do in these demands, he might write; "and yet I tell you," he added, "you have wounded the Emperor's heart somewhat because you make yourself party with the Frenchmen; and I doubt now whether he will anything write to Don Inigo of that I told you of the duchy of Milan or not." But he might write to Wolsey that Buclans would promote the matter, and desired to know his pleasure. Leo said he would write no such thing but upon better grounds, and that they had no cause "to stomach anything." He half sighed at Leo's words, evidently regretting the breach of the marriage. Has got Buclans to promise that if the Emperor write about the matter to Don Inigo he will show it to Lee.

Noted two things in what the Emperor told us : 1, that he would have taken no notice of the French demands but for the King and Wolsey ; and 2, that he will concede nothing above the treaty of Madrid.

Went to court with the French ambassadors on the 20th, and had a common answer containing in the end these words in answer to our petition :—"and moreover, as touching the king of England's debts, we be all ready to pay them." Some discussion of old quarrels then occurred with the French, which we put an end to. Nassau told Tarbes that if the Emperor were handled gently, he was never more inclined to peace than now. Think there will be little sticking, except at Milan, and the ready payment of 2,000,000.

After this De Buclans took Lee apart, and said he saw the French would be glad to leave England, and adhere to them. Perhaps De Tarbes has uttered to them apart the words of the 4th instruction, which they feared to show to us, as mentioned in the common letters of the 17th July. Buclans has just informed him that the Emperor is now writing to Don Inigo. "Touching Milan he now despatcheth a post into France, but no further."

Wrote briefly on the 17th of all occurrences since the arrival of Poyntz. We have since pressed the Emperor for reformation of his demands ; but he has only put in a clause at the end, that if the King think he should abate any of them, he will do more for him than for any prince. Buclans says many things are put in demands here only pro forma, "as one touching your Highness, which we utterly refused." They took it "egrelie" at this time, that, after the French had consented to our receiving answer for both, we let them insist on its being given to us jointly, so that they take us now for parties instead of mediators. They declare if the King will let them alone they will do well enough with the French king. The Emperor has written about a marriage between the duke of Richmond and the daughter of Portugal. I have written to my lord Legate of our conversations about Milan with the Secretary. Thinks, if well handled, it might come to pass. On the 20th we had answer given to us jointly. The Emperor insinuates that they do not expect all they demand, "but that much shall stand in the hands of your Highness." Valladolid, 21 July 1527.

The Emperor sent Boelans to me (Lee) after the dispatch of my servant, desiring that some one might be sent after him. He wished Lee to inform Wolsey, who, he hears, has arrived in France, that he had just received letters from his ambassador there, stating that a great personage had asked him to write to the Emperor to come to terms; that France had entered league with England, which Wolsey had come to confirm, but as the treaty was injurious to France he was putting off meeting with him till he heard from De Tarbes, as he would fain do somewhat with the Emperor first.

It is the object of the Imperialists to bring over to their views the king of England, or at all events separate him from France, and therefore they have no thoughts of peace, whatever they pretend, or whatever conditions be offered them. They think the union between France and England will not last. The French seem to be very anxious for peace, and in all conferences with the Imperialists that some handle should be given by which they or we might renew the colloquy with them. They urge us to do this as of ourselves, showing that they are anxious for a treaty of peace; on which account they offered by Avemaria 3,000,000. The Emperor told us that he had little trust in it until the bishop of Tarbe, wishing to clear his master of it, did, in fact, prove it. For, finding the friar in his house, he bade him tell us what instructions he had received; and he, beginning at the close and not at the commencement of his commission, said that Lautree at the friar's departure had ordered him not to spare money for the liberation of the [French king's] children; that he had offered 1,000,000. I know well that never less than 1,000,000 was offered, and I suspect that it was increased by a million. I guess as much from the Emperor's hint, and that it was proposed to pay by instalments. Doubtless Wolsey knows the certainty of the matter. Good authorities think that the envoy sent by the Emperor has no commission to liberate the Pope, and what is given out here is done only to stop people's mouths. It is rumored that your Reverence is going into France to separate the Church of England and of France from the Roman, not merely during the captivity of the Pope and to effect his liberation, but for a perpetual division.

According to your letter, dated Calais, 17th inst., spoke to the King about the right which you claim as Chancellor to the patronage of all benefices in those parts, showing that it appears by records in the Chancery that all the said benefices have always belonged to the Chancellor for the time being, and reminding him that, although you have twice or thrice given the benefices of Froyton and "your" Lady Church in Calais without contradiction, you presented the confessor of his household to the benefice of Froyton, causing the incumbent, your chaplain, to resign, for the accomplishment of the King's wish; and finally asking that your chaplain, whom you have presented to "your" Lady Church, may retain that benefice. To this he answered that Sir John Daunce and Mr. Hales, who have lately returned to this country from surveying his lands there, report that they found by record that the King is sole patron there, and that the Chancellor's privileges do not extend to the benefices in the marches of Calais and Guisnes. This report, previously made to you, you reported to him, "which he did never know before, but then first by your relation, adding thereunto, whereof I marvelled, that his Highness was not only patron but also curate;" and these being his rights, he is surprised that, without asking his pleasure, you should attempt to give away the said benefices, considering that you have formerly defended his title against all others; and his opinion of you is that you would rather yield part of what is due to your office than wittingly attempt anything against his prerogative which might be a precedent to your successors. As you have caused the incumbent of Froyton to resign in favor of Mr. John Crayford, his confessor, if you can show that the patronage belongs to you, he thanks you most heartily for doing so; and although he doubts not that the gift of "your" Lady Church belongs to him, he would not refuse it if you wanted it for any of your chaplains; but since you do not ask for it, and say that the incumbent cannot be honorably removed, he is content that he should retain it as his gift, and, in recompence, your Grace must give to the clerk of his closet, according to your writings, the next vacant benefice of equal worth in your gift. Has received the Cardinal's letters. Has already proved his devotion to the Holy See. No person of sense can blame him for the occurrences at Rome, but they must be ascribed to those who have seduced the Pope, by false promises and by terror, to take arms against the Emperor, his protector, to break the truce with Don Hugo de Moncada, and occupy the kingdom of Naples, which excited the army to attack the city without orders from the Emperor. Received letters from the ambassadors in Spain, with a schedule of the Emperor's demands. Sends copies with marginal comments. Although the demands are very high, beyond what the King deemed convenient, thinks that, as he is willing to modify them, at Henry's request, some good may ensue, and is not sorry that they bear "a visage of some difficulty" until the Cardinal has concluded what he has to do with the French king. From what he has seen is in hope that the King's matter shall pass with Francis, for which he has made the best speed he could; but Francis desires to meet him at Amiens, where he cannot be before Thursday, in consequence of his mother's illness. Points out the dangers likely to ensue from the intentions of the Emperor to draw the Pope into Spain. To prevent this he has urged the French king to set forth his fleet under Andrea Doria, and purposes to write to the Pope pointing out the dangers that are likely to ensue.

Has had a long talk with Gregory Casale of the lamentable affairs at Rome, and thinks that the Pope's letter to the King, written with his own hand, will stir up his zeal in the Church's cause. Has received by Casale similar letters of the Pope and of the Cardinals in captivity, and is so moved with sorrow that he is ready to shed his life and blood in their behalf. Commends Casale for his conduct, and intends to make him commissary of the foot to be sent to Italy. Has practised with the marquis of Mantua "to come into the parties of the League." Thinks the Venetian ambassador should be spoken to, that the Signory may be made more diligent. Is extremely well entertained, but finds in all the towns great dearth, misery and poverty, and very ill lodging, very inferior to those in England. Sends a decipher of the bishop of Worcester's letters, by which the King will see that the Emperor wishes to sow suspicion between France and England. Abbeville, 29 July. Signed.

For the first the Pope's deliverance will be necessary, for the other the convocation of the Cardinals in France. The Pope's deliverance cannot be accomplished except by a peace between the Emperor and the French king, which is not likely, considering the high demands of the former; but I will endeavor to see what can be done in this matter. If the Pope were delivered, I doubt not he would be easily induced to do everything to your satisfaction.

The Cardinals can meet at no place except at Avignon, whither I propose to repair to devise with them for the government of the Church during the Pope's captivity, "which shall be a good ground and fundament for the effectual execution of your Grace's secret affair." As I shall then be within 100 miles of Perpignan,—a commodious place to treat with the Emperor,—I think it would be desirable that a meeting should be held between him, the French king's mother and me; and in the event of the Emperor persisting in unreasonable demands, I, and the rest of the Cardinals in France, may then make declaration that we will not be bound by anything the Pope may do in his captivity. Though I have devised this "for the advancement of your particular affair," being ready and prone to do all things that may confer thereunto, it is not my intention that this meeting with the Emperor shall take place unless I am constrained to go to Avignon. 29 July. 3312. CHARLES V. to DON INIGO DE MENDOZA.*

We have duly received your despatches of the 13 July, and at the same time the letter of the Queen our aunt, of which Francis Phillips was the bearer. He, in virtue of his credence, has told me in substance what we already knew by your letters, respecting the affairs of the said Queen. You may well imagine how sorry we were to hear of so scandalous a proceeding as the one in contemplation, one of such bad consequences, and from which so many evils are sure to originate, besides occurring at such a time and in so unfavorable a conjuncture. It is, however, our intention not to be in fault with the Queen our aunt, but, on the contrary, to do everything in our power on her behalf.

To this end, it seems to us, as a commencement of remedy to the impending evil, that the affair ought to be treated at first with all possible moderation, and by means of kind remonstrances. We have, accordingly, written a letter to the King in our own hand, begging that he will place full credit and reliance in whatever you may have to communicate to him on this affair; and we also send you a copy of the said letter of credence, that you may judge yourself of its contents.

You will inform the King how, through yourself, or in any other way you may deem more fitting and appropriate for the occasion, we have had cognizance of the actual state of things between his serenity the King and the Queen, his wife and our aunt. How, immediately after the receipt of such intelligence, we took up pen, and wrote to him the inclosed letter in our own hand, without communicating its import to any member of our Privy Council and others, or asking their advice upon it, as the matter is of such nature and importance.

You will further tell the King that, in order better to keep secret the contents of our letter to him, we have abstained from sending to him one of the gentlemen of our chamber, as we at first thought of doing; and that, foreseeing that this dispatch, as well as our private letter to him, must needs go by land, we have, with infinite trouble to ourselves, put the same in cipher, difficult and intricate as you know it to be.

* For this extract I am indebted to don Pascual de Gayangos.

That, knowing her great virtues, his good and righteous intentions, and the perfect love he has always borne towards us and our affairs, we cannot in any manner be persuaded to believe in so strange a determination on the part of his Serenity, and one which is calculated to astonish the whole world, were it to be carried into effect. In fact, we do not believe it possible, considering the good qualities of his Serenity and of the Queen his wife, the honorable peace in which they have lived together for such a number of years, as is notorious throughout the Christian world; the Queen herself being so good and virtuous, loving the King as she does, having always conducted herself towards him in the most irreproachable manner, and being of such high royal blood. To which we may add that, having so gentle a Princess for their daughter, it is not to be presumed that his Serenity the King would consent to have her and her mother dishonored, a thing in itself so unreasonable that there is no example of it in ancient or modern history.

For even if it were right and allowable to say or think—which is by no means so—that the Pope could not dispense in this marriage, and even supposing the existence on that occasion of the motives alleged, or other causes and reasons still stronger of any kind whatsoever, of which there is none, to procure such a scandalous dissolution of the match, it would be a far better and more honorable proceeding to keep the matter secret, and work out its remedy, if necessary, though we again say that such motives and reasons do not and cannot exist.

Nor is it likely that such innovations proceed from his Serenity, but from persons who bear ill-will towards the Queen and ourselves, and who care not what evils and disasters may spring therefrom. For, as we have no doubt that you will be able to show and prove to the King, the present affair is one in which several princes of Christendom are deeply concerned, and which in future times may prove to be the cause of great troubles and dissensions among them; some maintaining that the Princess his daughter, after the King's death, is legitimate and true heir to his crown; whilst others may say that the king of Scotland, by his mother's right, ought to succeed to the throne of England; besides which, other political questions connected with the above might give rise in England to everlasting feuds and partialities.

You are, therefore, to entreat his Serenity, in our name, well to consider and ponder the whole matter, and to call his especial attention to the three following points:—1st, to take in good part what we tell him in a friendly way, and to believe that in thus addressing him we have only said what we knew to be most advantageous to himself and to us. 2nd, that he may be pleased, for the honor and service of God, to put an end and remedy to so scandalous an affair. 3rd, that he may also be pleased to treat it with such secrecy and reserve as is needed in a case of this sort, and which concerns alike him and ourselves, a precaution and warning which the King, in his great prudence and discretion, is sure to duly appreciate. And you are also to promise, in our name, that whatever measures may be required to ensure the said secrecy we are ready to take, out of perfect love for him, and for the said Queen our aunt, and for the Princess their daughter, and for the whole kingdom of England.

A duplicate of this dispatch shall be forwarded to you by sea, and at the same time Francis Phillips shall return to England. He shall, moreover, be the bearer of a letter of ours to the Queen our aunt, to whom you may, as soon as possible, communicate the contents of this dispatch in the manner that you think most proper for her tranquillity and satisfaction, giving her at the same time such advice as may console her in her present affliction.

Besides the above-mentioned provisions, and in the event of the Queen not deriving any benefit in her case from the appellation, we have presently written a letter to our viceroy of Naples, informing him at full of the quality and circumstances of the case, and commanding him to obtain secretly, and in the best manner possible, from his Holiness, a letter or brief wherein, in the mildest terms and with licit exhortations, he may persuade the King and his ministers to put a stop to the evils which must necessarily arise out of so scandalous a business. And we ourselves have also written to his Holiness, through another channel, respecting this ugly affair, entreating him to revoke the legatine power conferred on the cardinal of England, or, if he should deem it more advisable, to command by sentence that neither the said Cardinal nor any other ecclesiastic of England, of whatever rank or dignity he may be, take cognizance of the said affair, he (the Cardinal) being suspected of ill-will towards the Queen our aunt; but, on the contrary, the case to be brought forward at Rome before his Holiness and the Sacred College of Cardinals, there to be tried and judged by them.

A duplicate of his Holiness's resolution in this matter shall be addressed to you, by way of Germany, with all possible secrecy; and you may show it to the King as emanating from the Pope proprio motu, and by reason of his pastoral dignity.

For your better information in this affair we send this by the general of the Order of St. Francis, with whom, and with our Viceroy at Naples, you may correspond by means of your own cipher, to which they both have a key.

True it is that we would very much prefer, were it possible, to attend to the remedy of this present evil secretly, rather than bring it to such scandalous evidence; and yet, if no other means be left, we cannot but do everything in our power to assist the Queen our aunt.

We have likewise written to the Cardinal the enclosed in our own hand, which you can forward to him if required, or else keep it by you until his return (from France). If you decide upon having it sent to him, let it be secretly, and through some person deserving all your confidence. Valladolid, 29 July 1527.

3313. JOHN HACKET to [WOLSEY].

Yesterday, at 5 p.m., delivered Wolsey's letters to my lady Margaret, in presence of my lord of Rawysteyn, Mons. de Hoeghatrat, the president of the council of Machlyng, the Treasurer, the Receiver-General, the Audienccer and other lords of the Privy Council. When the letters had been read she took him aside to hear his credence, to which she answered in these words:—"Mons. l'Embassadeur, serys je suys fort rejoy et byen aysse de savoyer la bonne et sayne intens[ion] de Mons. le Legat; et quant à moy, de ma [part], pour tout ce que le comun voyx povoyt cha[nter] ou dyre, je ne me desconfroy james que le R[oy] ne mondit sieur le Legat vouldroyent deffaïre ny rompre les bonnes et vyeux aliansses de luers ansiens et assures amys pour tenyr la part d'ung aultre luer advers et aussiene ennemy nouvellement reconsillé ne sa quytte de sa foy ne promesse comme il est tenu de ferre. Et pour myeux fere mon devoyr je escryveray à sa bonne grace laquel vous ly enveroyes le plus tost que vous pources." Sends her letter with this by a servant of his own for safety.

Dined yesterday with Hoghestrat. After dinner he asked what we thought of Wolsey's going into France? Said that, as far as he could judge, Wolsey's intent was entirely for the good of Christendom, to promote peace and union, and no man could thank him enough for his sincerity and great labour. To which Hoghestrat answered: "Serys, Mons. l'Embassadeur, vous parles de bonne et cordiale affectyon, je pry a Dyeu que ansy soyt come vous dytys et quydes, car aultrement je vous promes que les alferes ne ce porteryent sy byen comme acquiesces quydent que feryent, et vous sertesye que à ceste foyz ung verra et cognostera le sawoyer et intendement le bon woulloyer ou autrement de Mons. le Legat ;"—meaning that if we break with the Emperor, we shall repent it as soon as they. Hopes that we shall keep peace with our neighbours, and do some good works in Italy.

Some men in authority here have said that we have broken the intercourse by preventing our merchants at Calais from coming into these parts. Said that every man of these countries may resort to Calais, and trade there as freely as our merchants may do here ; the King intends to amend his own town and subjects, but the intercourse will not be restrained, except by their own fault. Hoghestrat said he had news from Rome that the Emperor is master of most part of Italy ; that the prince of Orange, at his leaving Rome, rede with a naked sword in one hand, and a burning torch in the other, to signify his intended treatment of all towns that will not obey the Emperor.
If so, should not be surprised at the old proverb coming true :—"Hy mynd with prid wyll have a fall, and wet not howsoever yt sall." He said also that the castle of St. Angelo is kept by 500 Spaniards and 300 Dutchmen, and that Mons. della Motte is holding Rome with 7,000 men ; that Lautrec will not pass the frontiers of France, and the Swias who were coming to him through Savoy have turned back ; that the Pope has offered, for his ransom and that of divers cardinals, 400,000 ducats and certain towns ; and posts have been sent to Spain to know the Emperor's mind. Gant, 30 July 1527.

The Lady Margaret told him as a great secret that she heard for certain, that before Wolsey left England, there was great speech of a separation of marriage done or in treating to be done between the King and the Queen, and asked Hacket if he had heard of it. Said, "No," and told the truth.
Perceives that my Lady, for this cause and others, would fain speak with Wolsey before he returns home. Asks if he shall write to the King in Wolsey's absence. Some here say they are [not] sorry for the Pope's misfortune, and think that God has punished him for defying the Emperor in a rightful quarrel and taking the French king's part in a wrong one, and also for dispensing the French king to perjure himself, when he might as well have induced him to keep his promise. Every man here has his tongue at liberty. Sends to the Secretary, Master Deyr, the ciphers in this letter, lest Wolsey should not have his cipher, in consequence of Take's absence.

As the king of France has chafed his leg, and brings with him his mother, the queen of Navarre, and lady Renée, he has sent Rochepot to say it will be Friday or Saturday before he can reach Amiens. I have received letters from Spain, of 21 July, including five articles, among them a blind proposal to marry the duke of Richmond to the daughter of Portugal, with gift of the duchy of Milan. 3318. SIR WM. FITZWILLIAM to WOLSEY.

The King intends to go to Hennyngham on Tuesday week, for two or three days, and then return hither. He will start for Greenwich on Aug. 27, hunting in Waltham Forest and thereabouts till near Holyrood Day. He will stay near Greenwich till Wolsey comes home.

The King is keeping a very great and expensive house, for there are lodged here the duke of Norfolk and his wife, the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, the earls of Oxford, Essex and Rutland, viscounts Fitzwalter and Rocheford, both the ladies of Oxford, and others. He and the other officers intended to have reduced the expences this summer, but he does not see how it can be done. The King is merry and in good health, and hunts daily. He usually sups in his privy chamber with the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter and lord Rocheford. Beaulieu, 31 July. Signed.

3319. GHINUCCI, LEE and POYNTZ to WOLSEY.

According to Wolsey's commands, visited the general of the Franciscans, who had been closeted four hours with the Emperor. He told me that nothing was more annoying to the Emperor than that in our proposals nothing was said of the marriage with lady Eleanor; and he would make no agreement without it. He further said that the success of the negotiation depended chiefly upon the King and your Grace. He lamented the sack of Rome, endeavored to excuse the Emperor, and spoke of truce with a view to peace. After this was visited by Ave Maria, who excused himself for what he had said to us in the presence of Tarbes, that he had offered to the Emperor 1,000,000, and he now told us that he offered the same sum in addition to the 2,000,000 offered for the Viceroy. He had no written commands for this. I, the Almoner, have stated already that Francis is satisfied that the King and the duke of Savoy be judge in this matter. The French ambassadors begged our assistance. We said we had already made our offers, and had no further instructions. Tarbes told us that he had a secret commission; which we wonder he did not tell us of before, as we had assured the Emperor we had no others. They have entered into secret practice with La Chaulie, Nassau, then with the Emperor and Buklance, without having communicated with us. The Emperor said he had received no satisfactory proposals, and when he did he would let us know. They said they were invited to war. I enclose you the letters of Buklance, asserting that this is a mere sham. Details the Emperor's observations on the offers made him. Buklance said that whatever the French ambassador appeared to offer at the suggestion of our King they would continually offer him more, and more, and more, of themselves. He said that he had seen letters announcing that you had taken to the most Christian King 200,000 nobles.

We asked him when the Emperor was going to send a gentleman into England. We were very urgent for the liberation of the Pope. He said he did not know to what state the Pope was; that he had sent the lord Millwell, of his privy chamber, to assure the Pope he was a good son of the Church. All the ships in Biscay have been sequestered.

Did not think it necessary to send a courier, but De Tarbes says he knows more of the King's mind. Urged, as the sea was dangerous from the Moors, that it would be better to send a copy of Moos. Whether the practices between the Emperor and the French ambassador have any solid foundation, will not decide. Thinks that the Emperor would be glad to separate the kings of France and England, to throw difficulties in the way of Wolsey's negotiations. The French ambassadors are very much set upon procuring the liberation of the children, and therefore are easily tempted by the Emperor's offers. The bishop of Tarbes is as credulous as the rest.

He would have done it sooner, but for a similar request made by the French ambassadors, who asked leave to see the Dauphin and the d[uke of Orleans]. Whatever the French ambassadors shall do or say, the writer is ordered by the Emperor, out of the love he bears to the king of England, to communicate to the English ambassadors.

Love Letters,

For a present so beautiful that nothing could be more so I thank you most heartily, not only for the splendid diamond and the ship in which the solitary diamond is tossed about, but also for the pretty interpretation and too humble submission made by your benignity. I should have found it difficult to merit this but for your humanity and favor, which I have sought and will seek to preserve by every kindness possible to me; and this is my firm intention and hope, according to the motto, Aut illic aut nullibi. Your letter, and the demonstrations of your affection, are so cordial that they bind me to honor, love and serve you. I desire also, if at any time I have offended you, that you will give me the same absolution that you ask, assuring you that henceforth my heart shall be devoted to you only. I wish my body also could be. God can do it if he pleases, to whom I pray once a day that it may be, and hope at length to be heard. The time seems so long since I heard of your good health and of you, that I send the bearer to be better ascertained of your health and your purpose; for since my last parting from you I have been told you have quite given up the intention of coming to court, either with your mother or otherwise. If so, I cannot wonder sufficiently; for I have committed no offence against you, and it is very little return for the great love I bear you to deny me the presence of the woman I esteem most of all the world. If you love me as I hope you do, our separation should be painful to you. I trust your absence is not wilful on your part; for if so, I can but lament my ill fortune, and by degrees abate my great folly.

Compliments them on their circumspection, of which the King and he have so high an opinion that he is ordered to entrust them with the most secret matters. A rumor, somehow or another, has sprung up in England that proceedings are being taken for a divorce between the King and Queen, which is entirely without foundation, yet not altogether causeless; for there has been some discussion about the Papal dispensation, not with any view to a divorce, but to satisfy the French, who have raised the objection on proposing a marriage between the Princess and their Sovereign.

The proceedings which took place on this dispute gave rise to the rumor, and reached the ears of the Queen, who expressed some resentment, but was satisfied after explanation; and no suspicion exists, except perchance the Queen may have communicated with the Emperor on the subject. You are to discover if anything of this kind has taken place; for, from the time the rumor began, Ferdinand her physician left, and afterwards Francis Philippos. As the whole rumor is false, I should be sorry if the Emperor believed it, lest these lies should prove an obstacle to the peace.

You are to watch Ferdinand and Francis; and, if the Emperor drops a word of the subject, make such a prudent reply as will overcome his prejudices. You are to say nothing about the French objections. But, if you hear anything started, answer summarily that no dissolution of the marriage is intended, but only the confirmation of it, in the event of any question being raised, and that it is foolish to suppose so grave a cause could be decided in private. I have told you all the circumstances, by which you will gather how unfounded the rumor is. You will observe silence with regard to the objections of the French. The bishop of Worcester is to return. R. O.

Heard this morning that the King would not be at Amiens before Saturday. This night past he lay at a place of De Piene's, three leagues hence, and is to be at Montdidier tomorrow. Went to the Chancellor, and expressed his surprise that the King was not to be at Amiens this day, in accordance with his promise on Tuesday. The Chancellor said he would inquire the cause of the delay, but could not promise that the King would be there tomorrow. Wonders Francis does not consider how long Wolsey has waited at Calais and at Abbeville. Brightwell (Breteuil), Thursday, 1 Aug. Signed.

3329. JOHANNES NALDINUS to the FLORENTINE AMBASSADOR in FRANCE.

R. O.

Was commissioned by the Council of Ten to precede Antonio Francesco Albizi, who was deputed to receive Lautrec on his coming into Tuscany. Had to inform Lautrec of the confusion existing in the army of the confederates, the departure of the Germans and Spaniards out of Rome towards Lombardy, and the remedies which are required. The city had undertaken to pay eighteen constables, with 3,500 foot, besides another 3,000 which are partly in the army of the League and part at Perugia under Don. Orazio; nor would it have been necessary to have asked aid of Francis and Lautrec if the marquis of Saluzzo and the Venetians had furnished half the number of soldiers they were bound to furnish, for then the Spaniards would not have dared to evacuate Rome or advance into Tuscany. The small number of foot, not more than 6,000, furnished by the League, is the reason of this. Has been sent to urge Lautrec to send Peter of Navarre or some other to Bologna with 6,000 or 8,000 foot at least, which may be of use to Bologna, Parma and Piacenza, if not to Florence. If this be done in time, you must co-operate with the bishop of Xaintonge. Would to God the Spaniards would go by any other way than Tuscany! The city, however, is determined to show its goodwill to Francis. The Spaniards have committed great devastations, and attempted to enter Perugia where Orazio is with 1,000 foot and 200 horse. He expects to hold out with aid of the army of the League. The number of the Germans and Spaniards who left Rome was 10,000; but they were expecting more, and many others joined them in hope of plunder. If they advance, the army of the League must retreat. The Marquis and the Venetians say they have no money to make up the due number of foot. Fire and destruction threaten us. We know not where to turn. The city is in great peril, all through the faithlessness of the allies. When the soldiers are accused of misdeeds, they say they are not paid, and we suffer from our own men.

Dom. de Veli arrived here some days ago. Had great difficulties to encounter on the road, mainly on account of the plague. Is going to Asti, where they say Lautrec will be tomorrow. Left the French fleet and Andrea Doria stationed off Genoa. If 3,000 foot came by land, they would bring it under the dominion of France. Savona, 1 Aug. 1527.

Asks the King and Wolsey to write to Lautrec to advance as soon as possible against the enemy, and liberate Rome, the states of the Church and the Cardinals; to restore to the Church, as soon as there is an opportunity, the city of Rimini, which is occupied by Pandolfo Malatesta and his sons; and to reduce Sienna to obedience to the Holy League, as now it favors the Emperor, and can supply his forces with money and stores. Asks the King and Wolsey to desire the ambassador in France to thank the King and his mother for the good despatch which they gave to the writer, the envoy of the Cardinals at Parma, and for their letters to Lautrec in favor of the Pope and Holy See; and to request them to write again commending this expedition.

3332. CHARLES V. to HENRY VIII.

Writes to ask his advice touching the late unfortunate circumstances at Rome. Has done so much for the Holy See that he thinks no sane person can doubt his sincerity. Has borne with injuries done him by France rather than make war for a private cause, and when in Germany refused the petitions of his subjects rather than violate the rights of the Pope. Many evils arose from this; but his conscience is clear, and his cause was vindicated by Leo X. and Hadrian VI. Clement VII., unmindful of favors, has sanctioned a league against him to drive his army out of Italy, and deprive him of Naples. Warned the Pope and Cardinals, before he took up arms, that the guilt would be theirs; but they not only despised his warnings, but violated the truce which Hugo Moncada made with them. The Pope having occupied several places in Naples, Charles's soldiers attacked Rome without his orders, and compelled the Pope to make an eight months' truce with the Viceroy. Although the conditions showed how much the Pope's advisers were opposed to him, Charles ratified it rather than take that vengeance which was in his power. But the soldiers, fearing this truce would be broken like the former, notwithstanding the remonstrances of their leaders, attacked Rome, and committed the outrage of which Henry has heard. Does not believe, however, it is so great as his maligners say. Is persuaded it was God's judgment rather than man's will, to punish the many injuries done to the Emperor; but is grieved at having gained such a lamentable victory. Hopes God will turn it to good, and thanks Him for what He does or suffers to be done. Valladolid, 2 Aug. 1527.

The plague is no longer reigning in Westminster. Since your departure there have been great assemblies of Sanctuary men, who endeavored to rescue the prisoners in the Gate-house. Mr. Scuse, Cromwell and I spoke with the Abbot and Sir Hugh Vaghan, and have ordered a watch. The Sanctuary men are more straitly kept; since which, Mulsey, a Sanctuary man, the King's servant, has refused the same, and gone abroad with a number of unthrifty persons, eight of whom have been arrested for stealing horses. It is suspected that the rioters intended some harm to your mansion in York Place. Last night my Lord Steward's servant at Chelsea was wounded. Sergier and Servington, of the Inns of Court, and one Pen, who lay in wait to slay Cromwell, made the rescue.

The prior of St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, is sick and likely to die. The friends of William Fynch, cellarer of the same, have offered to give you 300*l.* for your college at Oxford, for your favour towards his preferment. Dr. Barrye, residentiary of Southwell, is deceased, by whose death there is a prebend in York in your gift, and other promotions. The prior of Launde has gone to the coast to procure your salt provisions. Your buildings at York Place, Hampton Court, &c., go forward; and I understand from Cromwell, who has come from Oxford, that he has certified you of the forwardness of the works there.

I thank you for restoring me to the presidentship of Magdalen College, Oxford. My lord of Winchester minded to have prevented your visitation begun by Dr. Claybrok. Mr. Burges, the late pretended elect, and his electors have fallen into such breach of the statutes as without your mercy they shall be expelled. Burges has taken 75*l.* out of the College chest. The brigantine of Capt. John has just arrived, having intercepted a messenger from Genoa to the Viceroy, with letters from the Emperor's chancellor, which are enclosed. He will see from them that the Genoese are without hope. Advises him to send some of the Venetian infantry at Lodi and Marignano to assist in the siege. Is certain that it will be successful, and that the Imperial fleet can be afterwards defeated, about which he waits for instructions from Lautrec. Has today taken Chiavari and garrisoned it. More troops will arrive tomorrow, and he will then proceed elsewhere. Hears again from Genoa that they are in the greatest terror, and think it best to make overtures to the French. Though there may be other difficulties, will put in execution whatever he commands.

3337. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

R. O.

St. P. I. 235.

On Saturday last I removed from Abbeville to Pykeney, and lodged in a castle belonging to Mons. Vidama. After dinner on Sunday I left for Amiens, where the King and his train had arrived the day before. Was met by the corporation two miles from the town, and congratulated on my mission of peace, and purpose of restoring the French king's children. Was met by the French king and a great train, a mile and a half from Amiens; was lovingly received by him, bonnet in hand, and presented to the king of Navarre. The French king then saluted my lord of London (Tunstal), my lord chamberlain (Sunder), the comptroller (Sir Henry Guildford), the chancellor of the duchy (More). He then asked me of your welfare, wholly attributing his liberation to you. I stated that I had been willing to repair to Paris on hearing of his mother's illness; and thus passing together, placing me on his left hand, he talked much of your Highness, and caused St. Pöl, De Guise, and Vandemont to ride before him on three of the horses you had sent him, praising them very highly; and, considering the trust reposed in me by your Grace, he requested me to become his minister also, believing that by so doing his affairs would succeed better than they have done. He told me that Moret had taken and burnt two great carracks of Genoa.

As he had passed his palace I tried to dissuade him from accompanying me to my lodgings, which I found richly apparelled. Describes the furniture. Was then conducted to my Lady, who lodged in the Bishop's palace. Found there the queen of Navarre, the king of Navarre's sister, and a great number of ladies and gentlemen. She came forward and embraced me in a loving manner; saluted my lord of London, especially the earl of Derby, "whom it liked her Grace to kiss." I saluted the queen of Navarre and the ladies; which done, she took me by the arm, and led me to her inner chamber, where she talked in eloquent discourse of your Highness, and the benefits you had conferred on them, and offered her helping hand in anything you should require. Without entering into any particulars of my charge I thanked her, and took my leave.

On Monday was visited by the Imperial ambassador, who urged me to persuade the French king to accept the Imperial overtures. I told him I had been sent to urge the King to condescend to all reasonable conditions, and I hoped that the Emperor would mitigate his demands, and show himself really anxious for peace. At three o'clock I visited the French king, and found about 300 of his Scotch and Swiss guards in the hall. The King was lying on a couch, covered with a white sheet made for the easement of his leg, which was so much swelled that he could not stand. Found there his mother and many other ladies on one side, and cardinals, prelates, and nobles on the other. He excused himself for not rising; and I said I would have gladly alleviated his pain, and saved him the trouble of coming so far. He then took me and my Lady into a little chamber, compelling me to be seated while I delivered my message. I enlarged upon the affection you bore him, and I was sent for final perfecting such things as had been left to be determined according to the treaty. That, though unworthy, I had been appointed your lieutenant, chiefly to settle three things: the marriage of my lady Princess, deliverance of his children, and of the Pope. He expressed himself extremely anxious for his marriage with the Princess. And I asked him, as being her god-father, if it should take effect, how a peace would be made between him and the Emperor, and how his children would be delivered. To this he could give no reply. I then pointed out to him that much as he and you might desire the marriage, both of you must give up your wishes in order that he might recover his children. He then professed to be willing to treat on his own marriage with lady Eleanor, and that of the duke of Orleans with the Princess. On our discussing the propositions made by the Emperor, I urged him to strain a point for the good of Christendom and the delivery of the Pope, that the peace of Christendom might ensue.

On Tuesday I had another conference with him and his secret Council in my Lady's bed-chamber, when we discussed the peace and marriage at great length, with which I forbear to trouble you, considering also the business I have on every side, and the numerous despatches I am obliged to send to Rome, Spain and Venice. The sum of all is, that the French king is much at your command; that he has agreed to the treaty of Madrid; and, contrary to the opinion of De Vaulx, will condescend to the conditions to be offered to the Emperor by your ambassadors in Spain, to be arranged by common consent; also that a perpetual peace shall exist, whatever be the result of the marriage, between England and France; the contrary whereof has been, in a manner, the ruin of both realms.

We proceed tomorrow to the penning of the said peace, which shall be published, I hope, on the 15th. Details the events in Italy. Francis was content, considering the great expence likely to be incurred, to put off the proposed interview; also to renounce all pretensions to Milan: which must, however, be kept silent. Amiens, Friday, 9 Aug.

P.S.—My Lady, understanding that some opposition had arisen between me and the French king's council, came suddenly to my lodging, where we were assembled; and after she was seated, enquiring the cause of obstruction, she rated the Chancellor and others soundly, telling them they had more knowledge of merchandize than of Princess' affections,—that her son desired no difficulties to be made. As she was speaking the King came in, and insisted very strongly on his desire for most intimate union with the king of England. These words were spoken with tears in his eyes, and we all greatly rejoiced. Signed.

"And to show your Highness what I inwardly think, were it not the manifold benefits which I consider shall and is likely to ensue of this peace, as well for composing and redressing the enormities of the people and reformation of the Lutharian sect, as also many other private and particular commodities, with the restoring of the Pope's person to liberty, whereof what good effects may ensue, and what is letted and hindered thereby, your Grace, of your high wisdom, can consider; I assure your Highness I could have been content rather to have agreed to the loss of mine own hand than such conditions should be offered for a King's ransom, to the pernicious example of all other Princess being subject to such like misfortune and chance."

R. 9. Though I have found much affection in the French king, I have forborne at present to speak of your private matter, deferring the same till I have put your affairs in perfect train. I hope he will agree, and for this I study the means day and night. I have received letters from Hacket, out of Flanders, stating that it has come to my lady Margaret's knowledge that you intend to be divorced. No doubt, therefore, the Emperor has knowledge of it, and will do all he can at Rome to prevent it. "I have therefore, by the advice of my lord of Bath, devised certain expeditions to be made to Rome, as well by the bishop of Worcester, for whom I have sent with all diligence to come hither, as by Gregory Cassales and the Pope's ambassador (Salviati)." And I have not spared money in order to get access to the Pope to obtain his consent for convoking the Cardinals during his captivity, &c.

As I have found the French king so compliant it will not be necessary for me to go to Spain; and the same would be dangerous, as you have advertised me. As it is your request I should send Master Stevens to receive your instructions, I beg you will forbear the same "till ye shall be advertised of such expedition as I have, and shall conceive for the advancement of your secret matter," as he is the only instrument I have for the purpose. If I should send him he will be in peril of his life, for both he and I are much weakened by the excessive heat and continual labour. I will send Dr. Allen to learn your pleasure. this, last term, to Wolsey, who gave order to Mr. Paulett that no more such writs should be granted, but that the Escheator should process to find the said office. He had appointed a day for this next Thursday, but my Lady's counsel have procured the postponement till Friday after St. Bartholomew, hoping to obtain another supercedas. Begs him not to grant it. The King will have no loss by reason of any wardship. The only question is whether she ought to have the lands for life, as part of her jointure, or not. Dynnyngton, Suffolk, 16 Aug. Signed.

R. O.
St. P. c. 256.

So much time is required for engrossing the treaties that the solemnities thereof must be put off till Sunday next. On Our Lady's eve (14 Aug.) the Great Master came to me, telling me that Francis wished to go to the cathedral to hear evensong, and would be glad to meet me there. Accordingly I repaired with the Great Master to the King's lodging, who saluted me, bonnet in hand; and we proceeded through the church to the high altar, where were two traverses, one for me, and one for the French king. On the latter were two chairs; and when I prepared to leave him, he would not permit it, but made me kneel and sit with him, in view of all the people, "and so conforming myself to his commandment, we, kneeling together, making to the sacrament a few prayers, without suffering me to say to him evensong, or hearing the same said⁶ by others, he sat down in one chair, and made me sit in the other, talking about Italy, Lautrec, and the town of Besco.

I found upon inquiry that Lautrec was not so well furnished with men and money as he should be, and urged the King to look to it, as his reputation would suffer if there were any failure; whereas, if he succeeded, he would recover his children more easily. He promised to follow my counsel, and for that purpose Vademount, Joachim, and Gregory de Casalis shall be sent into Italy, and Lautrec substantially furnished. In further talk with him, his Grace entered into communication of the perpetual peace between your two Majesties; and, holding the image of St. Michael, which he had on his neck, said "Now the King my brother and I be thus knit and married in our hearts together, it were well done, it seemeth, that we should be knit par colletz et jambes," alluding to the Garter. It is for your Majesty to decide whether this interchange of Orders would be advisable.

Have also spoken with the French king about a General Council, and found him agreeable, according to a minute, which I now send, which will not a little confor to your purpose. I have also arranged that you shall not be compelled to undertake the protection of the treaty between Francis and the Emperor. It is also agreed that, notwithstanding his alliance with Eleanor, he shall not have any communication with the Emperor without your privy. Nothing now remains except to disclose your private matter, which I propose to do in so cloudy and dark a sort that he shall not know your utter determination. Amiens, 16 Aug. Signed.

Received his letter on 23 July (x. kal. Sextilis) at Paris. It was worthy of a King and a defender of the Faith. Is gratified by the King's continual regard for him. Wrote immediately, at length, what occurred to him at that time, but could find no convenient messenger. Afterwards met

"Reverende domine, affinis et frater bonus."

Thanks him for his letters. Supposes that though he was pleased at De Carpy's safe return with his wife and children, he is also in great trouble on account of the present calamities. Perhaps they are both to blame for their advice to the Pope, though it seemed best to them at the time. Knows that he will not be wanting in giving all the assistance he can. Is much fatigued with his journey. Would have been here a month sooner, but he was obliged to wait with the galleys at Porto Ercole; was detained for want of horses at Savona, Frejus (Friuli) and Avignon; and at Lyons, to make arrangements for his Countess, whom he left behind, and for proceeding himself, as he was without a son.

Intended to go to Amiens to pay his respects to the King and the cardinal (Wolsey), in whom alone the Roman court has hope. Casale, who is among the besieged in the citadel, can testify to this. All think that this meeting of the French king and the Cardinal will result in the liberation of the Pope and the safety of Italy. Heard, however, that Wolsey was about to return, and received a letter from the King, bidding him wait here to recover his fatigue, until he returned from his progress. Is sorry that he will not see the Bishop before his return to England, but more so that he cannot wait upon "amplissimo Domino nostro," which he desires so much to do, that he has determined to visit England before his return to Italy. 3353. CARDINAL SALVIATI to ———.

Lettere
n. 78.

I have received a joint letter from [you and] the cardinal of Cortona, exhorting me to pray the French king to persuade the free cardinals to convene in Bologna. It was the intention of his Majesty, as also of the king of England and the cardinal of York, that the cardinals should assemble in Avignon. But, to satisfy your desire, I spoke again to his Majesty (Francis) on the subject, and found him still of the same opinion, as Avignon is the more secure and convenient place for these cardinals, especially York, who greatly desires to be present; and, as it is nearer to Spain, messages can be more conveniently sent to the Emperor. The French king wishes you to come. Inform me at what determination the cardinals arrive. The French king promised to give the commissions which they require for the defence of the States of the Church, and ordered the Secretary to write to Laisir accordingly. The cardinal of York has warmly exhorted the French king to this effect, and is very active in endeavoring to procure the release of the Pope by means of the English ambassadors in Spain; this being the first point which the Cardinal demands from the Emperor in the negotiations for the universal peace. Gambara is here. Amiens (Ambrian), 17 Aug. 1527.

* In Vn B. ix. 144* is a blank leaf, which may possibly belong to the above document. It is addressed, "[R.] domino, D. Car^o de Salviatis," &c. "(in) Curia X^{ta} Regia," and endorsed, "Lettres in cifris [to Cardinal Salviatis]"

Tomorrow the perpetual peace between the kings of France and England will be published. The marriage of the latter's daughter to the French king [is to take place] in case the universal peace is not concluded. If it is concluded, and the French king take queen Eleanor, [the Princess] will be given to the French king's second son, the duke of Orleans.

3354. SIR WILL. FITZWILLIAM to WOLSEY.

Wrote in his last that the King would leave this on the 27th for Greenwich, passing the time till Holy Rood day in Waltham Forest; but in consequence of the sickness he has changed his plan. He will go to Berwick on the 27th, thence to Greenwich, and so to Oxford. No news, except that the King is much pleased with Wolsey's letters, and likes all he has done. But of this doubtless Master Secretary has written to him, whom Fitzwilliam esteems a right honest man and a friend to Wolsey. Is glad to hear that the great affairs are in such good train for universal peace. Beaulieu, 17 Aug. Signed.

3355. JOHN HACKETT to WOLSEY.

Hears that Wolsey has received his letter dated 30 July, with another from lady Margaret, who would be glad of a cordial answer. Received last night a letter for Wolsey from Wallop, and another addressed to himself, both inclosed. The king of Bohemia has lately sent a gentleman with letters and credence to the Emperor, with instructions to pass through England or not, as he thought best; but, in consequence of the advice of the governors here, he will take ship direct from Zealand to Spain.

Was this morning with Hoeghstrate, who is sore infected with gout. He asked for news from France. Said some good answer was daily expected. He said that Wolsey had told their ambassador there that if the business came to a good end, he purposed to meet my Lady before his return. He said also that if Wolsey could bring these two Princes to an agreement, it would be one of the best acts done this hundred years. It is reported that Andrea Dorry, captain of the Papal fleet, and the duke of Ourbyn, captain of the Venetian army, are both turned to serve the Emperor. Does not know if it is true. Gant, 17 Aug. 1527.

A plot to betray Tournay to the French has been discovered, and those implicated are being beheaded day by day. Flanders has consented to pay to my lady Margaret 36,000 guilder, besides the 150,000 guilder for the men of war.

Sends back his servant to know Wolsey's pleasure.

..... "[French k]ing should assist

"The 22nd article discontenteth his highness and saith that in lieu and place of the same [it should be] devised that the French king should not in an[ywise] empeshe, let or hinder, directly or indirectly, them[peror's journey] into Italy."

As to the 43rd article, which states that the French king would leave out the Venetians rather than that the peace should not succeed, the King says this implies contradiction, for a peace cannot be concluded without them, leaving them as a prey to th[emperor]. As they are powerful enough to resist the Emperor, and have hitherto stood out for the League of Italy, a special [article] for their comprehension should be devised in the treaty. The King will therefore not allow this article to remain in the book of offers, but it must be cancelled.

..... perform, bear, and accomplish [ina]smuch as the said conditions and offers by the King's mediation his Highness would should appear hereafter that he had so used him in the same that the offers were either very reason[able], or as near thereunto as might be studied and de[vised]."
Finally, when the King considers that there will shortly be a puissant army in Italy for the League, that the enemy is weakened by continual plague and stroke of God, so that [not] more than 9,000 remain, that the country is ready to rebel if they are assured of success, and that there are daily practices for it, he marvels that the French king so suddenly agrees to offers which, being observed, may bring h[is own] country into miserable servitude and subjection. If the confederates have any success, and Italy rebels "incontinently and co [the Emperor's coura]ge shall abate and be reasonable."

By these means the Emperor and the kings of England and France would join in a triple indissoluble knot; for as the French king would have Dame Allenore, and the duke of Richmond her daughter, with the duchy of Milan, there would be great hope for the long continuance of a universal peace. This would be a way to enter into a treaty arctioris conjunctionis et amicitie with the Emperor, which w[as] lately desired of the King by the Emperor's ambas[sador] here. St. P. I. 262.

According to his letters of the 16th, the peace was sworn on Sunday with great solemnity, as the King will be informed by the bishop of Bath, whom Wolsey intends to send in two or three days. The French king, my Lady, the king of Navarre, many nobles and prelates, are to dine with him today, and he is therefore much straitened for time. Sends a post with news from Italy, and copies of letters to the Viceroy, certifying the surrender of Genoa, with advertisements from Lautrec, Andrea Doria, and Theodore Trivulce, announcing other advantages in Italy, which will tend to peace, and the King's honor.

After dinner, the French king will visit certain places according to vows made in his sickness. Wolsey will be left with the Chancellor and others, in which Salviati and other cardinals will determine with him what is to be done during the Pope's captivity. Is then to meet the King at Compiègne.
Hopes that the Emperor's chancellor, who has always disdained that Henry should have such a stroke in Christendom, "shall scape narrowly, but he shall be brought under your Grace's hands," and then he shall see where his Complains of the hounds. Does not like the manner of hunting. Francis's favorite at this time is a maiden of Madame Vandom's, called Hely, "whose beauty after my mind is not highly to be praised." Has been told that the king of France would like to send his hounds into England, as it is more difficult to kill a deer there than in France, because of the hedges and ditches. St. P. iv. 474.

On his arrival from the South repaired to York assizes, where there was little business; thence to Newcastle with my lord of Richmond's council. Sir Will. Lisle and his son have been indicted for treason, and proclaimed throughout Northumberland for breaking prison at Newcastle and releasing rebels, stealing 40 horses at Widingerton belonging to Sir Will. Ellerwar, and driving them to Scotland, and burning a town belonging to Ellerwar. Several of the Duke's council still in the North have appointed to meet with Magnus here tomorrow. Will inform the King of their devices for the ordering of Northumberland, where there is great dearth of corn and poverty. Finds no means so convenient to avoid danger from the Lises as those he has devised with Sir Thos. Clifford for apprehending them. Because my lord of Cumberland has in his hands one of the headsmen of the Armestongs, Sir William knows how the whole of Northumberland "is highly charged for his taking," but will have no great doubt of the West Borders, where the practice is proposed to be put in execution. Sir T. Clifford will carry to the King an answer to his letters to the king of Scots and Angus. My Lord expects an answer shortly to his own letters to them, of which a copy will be sent to the King.

Was informed by Patrick Sinclair, whom he met at Newcastle, of the confidence James has in the King, and that the Queen his mother lies at Stirling, and goes little to court. A great assembly and council has been kept at Edinburgh, in which the archbishop of St. Andrew's was present; when it was determined that Angus should be Chancellor, and the bishop of Aberdeen should assist him. 3374. LEE and POYNTE to WOLSEY.

Received his letters. Had an audience on the 16th. The Emperor said that there could not be more assurance of the King's, the Queen's and your Grace's joy than he had conceived. He was delighted to find that you and the King put so much trust in him, and that you have made a journey to France for final resolution of the peace. We urged him to send a representative to England to communicate with your Grace apart in all points concerning his interests. He answered he would do what he could to secure peace, and had communicated his mind to don Inigo. We said the peace had not prospered in his hands, and if he would send some one he would find a reason to be contented with Wolsey's intentions to secure his interests. He promised to refer to his Council. To the secret cipher touching my lady Princess he said you might see how horribly what trust there is in the French "avowing that the matrimony between the French king and my lady Eleanor is as good and firm as between him and the Imperatrice;" and he hoped, if "the French king would consent to another marriage, the King's highness would not, and much thanked your Grace for this advertisement, promising to keep it close." We assured him, if he would send some one to you in France with instructions, you would do all to content him. He said, as the league was renewed with France, it ought to be with him. We urged that that was not judicious at present. He then told us, as a secret, that, in consequence of the arrival of the general of the Observants, he had stopped Milan (De Verrie), and sent the General in his room. He is so persuaded the Pope to come into Spain.

On Saturday the 17th, and so on to the Tuesday, we waited for an answer, which was deferred until the arrival of a promised despatch from France. Were admitted on the 21st, and urged him, instead of sending his messenger to England, to send one of his Council to your Grace in France, with instructions partly open and partly private, alleging that your Grace could not tarry long there, for the great train you have, and the need of your presence in England. He begged us to be patient until he had read his letters just come from France, promising to see us before he left on the 23rd. We sent to Almain to know whether he had any letters. He answered he had none for us, but had received good news; and he told us on the 23rd that the ambassador in France had written to the Emperor how your Grace had shown him that you had labored with the French king, with Madame and Madame d'Alençon, usque ad sanguinem, to obtain satisfactory conditions with the Emperor; and you had brought them to such points as the French king will not pass, though his sons should remain in Spain to the fourth generation. He, therefore, desired us to wait till these offers had arrived. We demurred, as the coming of the courier was uncertain. Sent at once to Lachaulie, notwithstanding, desiring to know the Emperor's pleasure. On being introduced we reminded the Emperor of his promise, who used the same argument as Almain had used. We urged, as he was long since resolved, he should not now hang back upon any offers to come, but send his resolution at once to your Grace. Contested his assertion that it would be somewhat derogatory to his honor to have a matter of this kind discussed in France; but he said at last, that if your Grace desired it, he would send, on condition of receiving a safe-conduct. We urged him to give us the name of the person; but he said he had not yet determined it with his Council, and would send a post in three days from Palermo. He promised to send at the same time the offers made him by the French ambassadors.

De Tarbes showed us the letters of Francis in which he stated that they might now go to the lady Eleanor without any dissimulation, as you had written to this purpose. In the same letters it was stated that, if the Emperor refused the offers that were now sent, they should join in denouncing war against him. "God forbid it should so follow!" They are not pleased that we denounce their secret practices. Will henceforth dissemble what they see, according to Wolsey's instructions.

The Council here is "disperkled" for sickness. The Emperor has been obliged to stay behind for a fever which the young Prince had. Thinks that the Emperor will delay his resolution until after his arrival at Palencia, where they will not be able to follow him, as no preparations are made for him. Wish instructions as to the 40,000 marks, of which 30,000 are for the pension and 10,000 for the French queen. Worcester, on his departure, was afraid he would not arrive so speedily, in consequence of his disease. Valladolid, 23 Aug. 1527. Signed.

Sent on the 3rd Aug. letters touching certain rumors here had of the Queen, of which they had also written to Wolsey. I trust I need not repeat it; but if hereafter I hear anything of it, as hitherto I have not but only by your own subjects, I shall order my answer accordingly. The Emperor has delayed giving him an answer in consequence of anticipated letters from France, but, after much solicitation, consented to send a person to my lord Cardinal. 3381. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

R. O.
St. P. I. 364.

Though the King will be informed by the bishop of Bath of what has been done and sped at Rome concerning the secret affair, and of Wolsey's opinion in answer to Knight's letter of the 19th, thinks it right to advertise the King of the final terms to be made between Francis and the Emperor. Gives an account of his proceedings therein, which he thinks will serve the King's purpose. With his leave the French would be glad to go to war, and not offer the Emperor conditions too favorable. They will be grateful if, through the King's mediation, the Emperor's demands are reduced.

News has come from Lautrec of the injuries done by Mouret and Doria to the Emperor's galleys. Before the news came it was agreed that nothing should be said of the renunciation of Milan, the exclusion of the Venetians from the peace, the abandonment of Gueldres, and other topics. Efforts will be made to discover whether the Emperor is inclined to confer the duchy of Milan on the duke of Richmond, as reported, as a dote for the Portuguese princess. Amiens, 24 Aug. Signed.

3383. The COUNCIL OF THE NORTH to [HENRY VIII.]

R. O.

After Sir Will. and Humph. Lisle had broken the prison "at your town and castle of Newcastle-upon-Tyne," they fled to Scotland, and joined a band of thieves called the Armestrongs, with whom and the Charletons, Nyksons, Dodds, and others, to the number of seven score, they entered Northumberland, and burned Holmeshaugh, a town of Sir Will. Ellerker's. They and their accomplices were indicted at the last assize at Newcastle before Sir Anthony Fitzherbert and Master Lyster, the attorney general, as justices of assize, and us, and have been proclaimed rebels. Send copy of the proclamation.* Are not sure if the indictment is legal, which they refer to the judges, though the case is aggravated. The proclamation is ordered to be made both in Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and on days of truce on the Borders. Send copies of letters* written on the subject by my lord of Richmond to the king of Scots and Angus. Northumberland, especially the wild parts, was in very good rule at the time of the Lises' escape. Have caused watches and espials to be laid throughout the county, and charged all the most expert men to be ready to resist the Lises. Since his escape, Sir William has spread reports that the King was never privy to his committing to ward. As to this, about a twelvemonth ago Sir William and his son were grievously complained upon before my lord Legate and others in the Star Chamber, both for seditious words and for riots in Northumberland; on which we had orders from Wolsey to commit them to

The Nuncio with the Emperor to the Nuncio in France. Granada, 27 Aug.

A nobleman from the king of England has just arrived. The ambassadors of France, Venice, Milan, and the Nuncio have determined to allow him to speak first, as the King is more a mediator than a participator in this business. He has done so, and the Nuncio has presented the brief. Today they all went to the Emperor, and begged him to enter the treaty. He refused, saying it was made to his prejudice; but if the Princes would confirm a universal peace, none would be more eager for it, that the Turks and heretics might be resisted. He complained of and made excuses for several charges made against him by the Pope, saying that if the Pope would show himself a good father, he would be a good son, and show the world that he does not want more extended dominions, but only the peace of Christendom. The French ambassador writes of matters relating to his master. The English ambassador, who was not present, is waiting for an answer to a proposition made in the King's name; if this is granted they will return to the Emperor. If not, thinks the English and all the other ambassadors will intimate whatever is ordered.

3400. WOLSEY to HENRY VIII.

Although, by letters to the bishop of Bath, your Majesty has been advertised of the news, yet, as I am informed by Knight's letter of the 29th, and by the bishop of Bath's letter of the 30th, that you intend to send him to Rome to promote your secret matter, and other things, I think it necessary to say: 1. That the French will not proceed to the renunciation of Milan, or aid the Emperor to obtain the Crown Imperial, except in a qualified manner. 2. I am fully assured by the bishop of Worcester that the Emperor has no intention of giving the duchy of Milan to the duke of Richmond, and the offer was only intended to deceive the King. 3. I am assured, on oath, that the bishop of Tarbes had no secret instructions in negotiating with lady Eleanor, beyond what is known to the English ambassadors, and that his purpose in going is to procure more easy terms from the Emperor through her intervention, which I think not undesirable. 4. I am afraid the Cardinals will not be persuaded to come to Avignon, especially as they have been commanded by the Pope not to leave Italy. I purpose, however, to devise articles for the government of the Church, with the papal legate Salvati, and other French Cardinals, in case the Emperor will not deliver the Pope. 5. I am of opinion that the bishop of Worcester will be a more suitable negotiator with the Pope than the Secretary (Knight), as he has more experience, and will have easier access to his Holiness, for which he has letters from the Emperor. My lord of Worcester is privy to your secret matter, and will more readily obtain a general faculty for me omnia faciendi et exequendi durante captivitate summi Pontificis, by which, without informing the Pope of your purpose, I may delegate such judges as the Queen will not refuse, and if she does, the cognizance of the cause shall be devolved upon me, and by a clause to be inserted in the general commission no appeal be allowed from my decision to the Pope; and also I may obtain protestation as contained in the minutes sent to the bishop of Bath. These two commissions may also be entrusted to the nuncio Gambarà, that he may negotiate with the Pope, in the event of the bishop of Worcester being refused admission. I am the more bent upon this, as I hear the Pope has been sent to Gaeta under strict guard. I have instructed Gregory (Casale), after he has settled with Lautrec and Sir Robt. Jerningham, to gain access to the Pope; and between this and Saturday I will despatch Worcester and Gambarà.

Since the bishop of Bath left, I have had long conferences with the dean of the Rota (Staffileo), who is now convinced that the Pope's dispensation is invalid. He has written a book in support of his opinion, which I will bring with me. He is ready to maintain his opinion in England. "If your Grace will take a little patience," and suffer such things to be done as shall be devised for the purpose, "your intent shall honorably and lawfully take the desired effect."

News is come that, from dread of Lautrec, the Spaniards have carried the Pope to Gaeta, who was not sorry to leave Rome, in consequence of the pestilence. The Emperor's army die in great numbers, and his affairs are ruinous, and will be more so when And. Doria arrives at Naples with the French galleys. Caesar Fregoso has made an attack upon Genoa, and killed more than 1,000. I am told by Worcester that the Emperor, whatever he may report, will not relent at any request you may make; but his drift is, with fair words, to deceive you, and prevent your stricter union with the French. He also told me, that, on hearing how by the detention of the Pope the churches of England and of France would decline from their obedience, the Emperor had sent the General of the Observants to set the Pope at liberty, and induce him to come into Spain, where he will probably be poisoned, and the See Apostolic established in Spain for ever. Methods have, however, been taken to prevent the Pope's voyage. Worcester also told me that before he left Spain the Emperor knew of your intention to be divorced, by the report of English merchants, and probably of Francis Philip, who had arrived and held communication with the Emperor for a whole day. Let me have the confirmation of the treaty of perpetual peace, which I have promised to deliver before my departure. It has been arranged that there shall be a duplicate, one sealed with green wax, the other with gold, to be interchangeably delivered.

P.S.—As I was enclosing these letters, the French king sent me the marquis of Saluce's letters, with an account of the Imperialists. Compiegne, 5 Sept.

If this letter be not elegantly indited, I beg you will take it in good part, as it was written at night. Signed.

Have great confidence in the King and Angus; but remind him, if any chance should happen, that they have sent repeated warnings. The Scotch king and Council are well inclined, but there are many of their broken men on the Borders, and it would be well to have frequent meetings at days of true. Understand that lord Maxwell is commissioned to make redress for Eshedale, Ewesdaill, Walcopdaile, and Annerdaill, and that earl Bothwell has found as sureties the prior of St. Andrew's and others to be responsible for Liddersdale. Advise him to arrange speedy meetings with Maxwell, and call on Bothwell for redress for the burning of Hameshaugh and Warden, by the Niksons and Nobills (not, as we are informed, by Sir Will. Lisle), who have "fyled your west wardenship by coming through Bewcastledale." Redress can be made by Bothwell at Cressop. Extracts from letters of Sir Gregory [Casale], 3 Sept., Lyons.

Sends news from Rome. The Germans are perhaps the cause why the Pope is not taken away to Naples, that they may the easier extort money. Will urge on the fleet. Lautree has been besieging Alexandria from Aug. 25, and it is thought he has some secret practices in the city. Hopes to find some means of sending or going to the Pope in the Castle (Castrum).

From letters of D. Paulo Camillo Triulzi.

Hears from a person coming from Rome that the Viceroy has sent to Rome the 2,000 Germans whom he had in the kingdom, who were living as they pleased, and dying of continual disease. The Viceroy was at Paliano, a place of the Colonnas, and it is said he wished to go to Rome, with the intention of removing the Pope to Gaeta. The Spaniards are fortifying themselves in the castle of S. Angelo, and are taking great pains to prevent letters being carried to and from Rome. Other Germans and Spaniards, who disagree with them, are marching towards Rome, and threatening the Viceroy that unless what the Pope promised is paid them they will desert to the French king. All these disagreements and mutinies seem likely to last, as they arise from want of money.

News from Rome, 18 Aug.

There are only two bands of Germans and Spanish foot, not 5,000 in number. Cardinal Farnese had gone to Porto Ercole, to cross into Spain, but was recalled, and the Portuguese ambassador sent in his stead. The Pope is of good cheer, trusting that he will be liberated by the Imperialists, and was ignorant of the arrival of the French in Italy. Card. Armellini was very ill at the Castle, and Giacomo Salviati was trying to obtain the office of chamberlain for his son, the Cardinal. The cardinal of Aragon and D. Pyrrino de Gonzago are both ill at S. Apostolo, and the cardinal of Ravenna outside the Castle. The protonotary Bentivoli is dead. The duke of Camerino has died there of the plague, "et quum ducissa ess[et]" she immediately sent her daughter towards Venice, and went to Camerino, where Rodolpho, the Duke's natural son, put her into the Castle as a prisoner. Giovanni Baptista Cibo immediately went thither from Umbria with some infantry, but was too late, as the Duchess was in the Castle. He entered the city, which he found devoted to him.

At Civita Vecchia four Spaniards have become powerless in their hands and feet, having had no previous disease. Others are, therefore, in great fear. Some of those who are now dead freed their captives, and released them from their ransoms, putting in their wills a clause that if they recovered they would not be free. Sarra Columna is said to have been killed with an harquebus by one of his own soldiers.

He has already made a breach in the walls of Alexandria, and hopes to take it in a few days, either through his intelligence in the town, or by force. Whether he takes it or not, he intends to come to Rome immediately. Meanwhile Andrea Doria with the fleet and Renzias will attack the kingdom of Naples, and hope to take Sicily.

Has received his letters, dated Edinburgh, 1 Aug., in answer to Henry's from Windsor, 8 July, for the arrest and delivery of Sir William Lisle and other English rebels succoured in Scotland. Is glad to hear James has made inquiry by the wardens of his Marches; but though James knows nothing of their reception in Scotland, Henry is credibly informed they are received by the Armstrongs within Ewesdale. Requests that if the Scotch wardens fail to apprehend them, English officers may be allowed to enter Scotland for the purpose, and that any slaughter that may be done on James's "broken men" in the attempt may not be regarded as a violation of the treaty. On the 11th inst. I received letters from the King, commanding me strictly, without any delay, to seal and deliver letters patent unto Rn. Long, of the controullership of the custom of wools, in the city of London. Remembering your commandment that I should advertise you before I sealed any other thing than common writs, and that Croke, who should make the said writs, is with you, I have sent him the warrant. I desire to know your pleasure, when I receive the said letters patents, whether I shall seal them or not. Calais, the 11th. Signed.

f. 70.

St. P. vi. 601.

Received on the 8th their letter, dated Paredes, the 1st. Sends them fresh instructions. They are deceived by Alemand and others, pretending that there is no wish on the part of England for a pence between the French king and the Emperor, and that the French do not deal candidly; whereas there is a hearty agreement between the French and English sovereigns, who are resolved on the deliverance of the Pope. Lee is craftily abused by Alemand. The offers the Emperor pretends to have received from the French are untrue. This is only done to see if he can get better conditions. They are to be on their guard against those who come to them in sheep's clothing.

Secondly, it is known by intercepted letters whatever the Emperor may pretend, that he aims at obtaining Italy, and becoming monarch of the world; and if he can bring the French king under his power, he will rule all other princes. Urges that the Emperor should be content with the sums offered to him by Francis, especially as he has not of late been so successful in Italy. Flanders and Spain are exhausted, and out of Germany he will get nothing. With a view of inducing the Emperor to condescend to one of the three ways contained in their instructions, the King is contented to forbear marrying his daughter to Francis, in order that he may marry Eleanor. Thinks the Emperor ought to comply, considering the inestimable favors he has received from the King, and that the Emperor has often professed that he did not want the duchy of Milan for himself. They are to assure him that Francis cannot be strained to any higher offers. Compiègne, 11 Sept.

After his arrival in France, used all his powers with the French king to persuade him to offer such terms to the Emperor as he could accept. Out of regard to the King and Wolsey's earnest exhortation, he has consented to final conditions to which he would never otherwise have condescended. They are to be offered to the Emperor, with intimation of hostilities if he rejects them. The King and I, however, hope they will prove acceptable; and that the Emperor, out of regard to the King, will concede one half of his demands, which exceed equity, remembering that all princes are subject to reverse of fortune. You shall, on your knees, after presenting my letters, request him to comply, by which he will secure the friendship of the King. If he refuses, their friendship must be dissolved, never to be repaired. Urge him to accept without delay; in what way sends instructions. Tell him secretly that if he complies, no matrimonial alliance shall take place between France and England to the Emperor's prejudice. No one will regard a war between the two countries with greater regret than Wolsey, but the interest of one prince must not lead to the destruction of Christendom.

Must be very cautious, and not allow their instructions in cipher to come to the ears of the Venetians, the Florentines, and the duke of Milan, lest they should take occasion to abandon the French king, and be drawn over by the Emperor, and thus he should become more intractable. Must join heart and hand in all things with the French ambassadors, as though they had been sent by the same sovereign; for between the two kingdoms Wolsey has concluded a close and lasting peace. Will not insist on the rest of his commission, as he hopes to find the Emperor tractable; especially as since the surrender of Genoa his affairs are not so prosperous in Italy. Is to urge the restoration of the Pope, whose detention is the greatest disgrace to the Emperor, and will provoke all the powers of Christendom against him. However, if he refuses, they are not to forbear urging the peace, as the one will follow on the other.

resignatione Chr. Regis ducatus Mediolani cum pluribus vestris literis Regia Majestas facta sit certior Casarem non habere in animo, ut sibi dictum ducatum haberet, sed ei rei potissimum inuitebatur ob promissum Duci Borbonie antea factum, nunc vero cum ob interitum Borbonii a dicto promisso sit liber, superiusque vobis dixerit, ejusque in Anglia orator Regie Majestati subinde affirmaverit, dictum Casarem ejus intuitu et requisitione magnam suarum petitionum partem velle remittere, nunc ipsius Casarem Majestati placeat; in qua re ex dictis promissis vehementer insistetis ad Regie Majestatis instantiam et præcipuam requisitionem et ob bonum pacis, unum aliquem modorum illorum acceptare et amplecti quos in instructionibus proponendis circa ducatum Mediolani explicatos habetis, non expectando aut requirendo perpetuam sibi dicti ducatus resignationem. Non enim ex Regie Majestatis esse videtur, si veri bonique mediatoris partibus fungens Regi Chr. persuadere velit, ut aliquid concedat quod forsitan ob malum exemplum in discrimen et præjudicium aliorum Christianorum principum post et quandoque redundaret.

Secundo, quod ad suppetias a rege Chr^{mo} Casari præstandas pro corona Imperiali assequenda, Regia Majestas considerans ad quam magna et grandia Rex Christianissimus sua interventione et suasionem devenerit et condescenderit, nec in hoc quoque justus mediatoris esset officium ut ulli persunderet, quod hujusmodi suppetias daret cum in regia Christianissimi potestate aut viribus non esset eas posse subministrare, habita ratione gravissimarum solutionum, quibus tum Casari, tum Regie Majestati ob ejus debitorum satisfactionem adstringetur, præter magnas alias solutiones, quæ aduatum Regie Majestati a [Rege Chr^{mo}] persolvuntur, ideoque indifferenti mediatoris partes non videntur, velle cum ad impossibilia attrahere; quocirca Casari modis omnibus persuadebitis quod omnia dictarum suppetiarum petitione contenta sit sua Casarea Majestas remissione et defalcatione trium millium scutorum, assignatorum loco dotis D. Ellonorm, et quod Rex Chr^{mo} teneatur quod nec directe nec indirecte Casaris in Italiam protectionem impedit, ad coronam Imperialem accipiendam, et potius quam res infecta sit Chr^{mo} contentos erit, loco allarum suppetiarum, restituere Casari naves et triremes captas, id quod æquivalens est et quodammodo majus dictis suppetiis.

Tertio, quantum ad Venetorum comprehensionem attinet, Casarem M^o dicetis quod Rex meus salvo honore suo persuadere non poterit Chr^{mo} Regi ut pacem concludat illis non comprehensis, præsertim quum et ille et Chr. Rex ex amicitia cum Venetis, jam olim initis et contractis, obligantur ut in omni tractatu et conclusionem pacis cum quovis alio principe ipsos in eisdem comprehendant; quamobrem nec Ser. Regie M^o honorificum nec æqui mediatoris partibus congruum judicaretur inducere quemvis principem ut agat quod fidei et promissis adversetur; quas condiciones ut proponuntur honoris et æquitatis ratio exigit ut Casar libentissimo gratissimisque animo accipiat, Ser. meum Regem optimi intimique amici partibus functum agnoscent, quod Regi Chr^{mo} persuaserit ut tam amplas condiciones illi offerret amplectendas omnino, etiam si multo minores et exiliores fuerint, ab eo præsertim principe qui paci propensum et studiosum se velit profiteri.

mutuo vestro consensu et iudicio id censeretur expedire ad pacem atque concordiam promovendam, in quam sententiam et ut idem efficiant dictæ Chr^m M^{tes} oratores expresse habent in mandatis, ad eum finem, ut in vestris omnibus actionibus haberi queatis veluti unus animus, spiritus et voluntas, et tanquam a principibus missi animo et voluntate conjunctissimis, inter quos eorumque regna ac subditos post meum hoc adventum concilavi, composui atque stabilissime firmavi perpetuam pacem, in omne ævum duraturam, querelis omnibus, petitionibus atque prætensis penitus sublatis atque sopitis.

Meorum vero commissionum residuum nunc prætereo ob causas quas superius addidi, in Dei potentia fretus, quod Cæsar ita rationi conformem se exhibebit ut nullam mihi sit ministraturus occasionem meas exequendi commissiones; ex qua re intimam lætitiā, perpetuamque jucunditatem concipiam, vero simillimumque videtur Cæsarem futurum nunc ad concordiam amplectendam inclinationem, cum ob Genue ditionem ejus in Italia actiones atque successus in non parvo discrimine versentur, quemadmodum ejus Cæsarem M^{tes} facile percipiet ex interceptis literis, quas ejus cancellarius ad viceregem Neapolis scripserat, et quas cum his ad vos mitto Cæsari ostendendas, priusquam ulla de proponendis articulis cum eo mentionem aut sermionem habeatis; quibus visis confido illum ad pacem futurum faciliorem, eo magis ubi intellexerit suam classem disjectam et captam esse, Genuamque ob defectum comestuum et fame coactam se [dedisse].

Prudentiæ itaque summæ fuerit ut priusquam Cæsaris actiones in Italia eorruant, pacem quæ ex magno illius honore et exaltatione nunc offertur acciperet, ne conversa Fortuna facie et hinc conatibus quandoque arridente, paucis conditiones maiores exilioresque redderentur, atque ita his adnexis instructionibus vos remittens, Deum precor ut hujus rei eum felicem et salubrem exitum vobis concedat, quem ego summis perpetuisque vobis ab ejus Divina Maj^{te} excepto, iterum atque iterum vobis redigens in mentem, vobisque commendans Pontificis et Cardinalium liberationem, quorum captivitas atque detentio Cæsari est non solum summo dedecori et infamia, sed etiam nisi brevi in suam libertatem asserantur pectora animique bonorum omnium principum et Christianorum hominum adversus ejus M^{tes} vehementissime irriti abeunt. Proinde rem hanc ex vestra prudentia copiose extendentes, declarantesque quanto animi ardore Regia M^{tas} ut Fidelis Defensor, Rex Gallorum ut Christianissimus, et ego ut humillimum ecclesiæ membrum, pontifici liberationi afficiamur, ad id Cæsaris animum pro viribus inducetis.

Ac demum, si tam magnæ oblationes nequeant Cæsaris animum infectare et ad pontificem Regisque Chr^m filios liberandos inducere, tunc vos acersum, quod etiam regis Chr^m oratores in unam eandemque sententiam facient, dominam Elionoram adhibitis, cui conditiones Cæsari oblatas exponetis, addentes regem Chr^m ad eas solo interventu Regiæ M^{tis} devenisse et quod pro bono pacis matrimonium cum eo concludere distolit inter filiam suam dictamque Regem Chr^m, contentus quod matrimonium dictæ Elionoræ cum Rege Chr^m sortiatum effectum contentus etiam in fraterna cum Cæsare amicitia si justissimas oblatas conditiones voluerit acceptare; quas si (quod Deus avertat) recusaverit eadem domina Elionora suo matrimonio destituetur, in ejusque hoc matrimonium inter D. Principissam et Regem Chr^m aliisque ætissimæ conjunctæ omnino succedet, in perpetuam, ut veretur, antiquarum inter Angliæ, Hispaniæ, Burgundiæque domos amicitiarum dissolutionem. ... proposed unto the Emperor for the conclusion of peace between him and the French king, and the redemption of the French king's childer. It is to be noted that the said lord Legate, opening his charge unto the French king of and upon the conclusion of the alternative, with the confirmation of the perpetual peace, and using all good reasons and persuasions to conduce the same to the King's purpose, it was first required, on the French king's behalf, that, before proceeding to the penning and ordering of such resolution as was taken and agreed between them, the said lord Legate should in the King's name condescend and agree upon such conditions as, finally refused by the Emperor, the King's intimation should immediately ensue; wherefore the said lord Legate, pondering— Without that it was ever meant or intended by the said Lord that these final offers should be first offered and made unto the Emperor, or that the same should be proponed unto him, but only in case of refusal of the other degrees to condescend unto these rather than the King's highness should enter into the war."

3415. FRANCIS I. to his AMBASSADORS IN SPAIN.

R. O.

Sends articles in French and Latin touching his relations with the Emperor, which Francis has devised after conferring with Wolsey. The form to be observed is as follows: The English ambassador will inform the Emperor of the news from Italy, and will show him these letters, written in the hand of his Chancellor, which were taken at sea, and of which Francis sends a copy. The said Chancellor "sest garenty a Monesque." Next day they will go with the English ambassador to the Emperor, and tell him that they have received an answer from Francis, who is entirely governed in this affair by the advice of England, to whom the Emperor referred the modification of the articles sent into France; that France and England have made perpetual peace and the most intimate alliance; that they both desire universal peace, and it is only the Emperor who hinders it. They are to get the terms for the payment of Francis's ransom made as long as possible, and that on the first payment his children be restored to him. Francis will give ample security for the annual payment, and would like to have abatement, on the first payment, of the sum due by Charles to the king of England, which Henry is willing to lend him. But if they can do no better they are to negotiate the articles in Latin and cipher, provided they obtain three things: 1, that Francis do not renounce the duchy of Milan, but that it remain to Sforza, according to the judgment of the king of England as arbiter. 2, Francis would not depart from his oath for any thing; but as to his being bound to help Charles in his going to Italy, both by land and sea, Henry is of opinion that it will be quite enough for Francis to pay his ransom. The Emperor asks that Francis should not hinder his going to Italy, but restore the galleys and ships taken at Portefin, and requests that the 200,000 crowns mentioned in the treaty of Madrid, which he is to pay to Francis for the marriage of the Emperor's sister, the lady Eleanor, be deducted from the 2,000,000 due from Francis for his ransom; otherwise he is willing to recompense it by the 200,000 crowns which Francis has promised to pay for the aid of Italy. 3, that the Venetians may be comprised in the treaty as Henry advises. Urges them to weigh everything coolly and deliberately, and to obtain for him the two things as much to his profit as possible, but to do nothing except in concert with the English ambassador, whom Wolsey has commanded to act along with them.

If they cannot obtain these three points, viz., of the Venetians, the renunciation of Milan, and not giving aid for the voyage of Italy, they are to conclude nothing, but protract the negotiations with fair words, sending a courier with all diligence to inform Francis of the points to which objections are raised, and of their conferences with the Emperor and Madame Eleanor. Francis will send them, in reply, the last resolution of himself and the king of England; and if it be not accepted, they and the English ambassador are to declare war to the Emperor. It is probable, however, that, considering the great army Francis has in Italy, which has taken Le Bosco, where a great number of Spaniards and lanceknights have surrendered at discretion, and been sent to their own country with white batons in their hands, and also considering the capture of Portefin and the galleys intended to victual Genoa, which Francis believes is at this moment in his hands, while the Emperor has but few men, ill-paid and without order, Francis expects they will not have so much difficulty in the negotiation. His army consists of 38,000 foot (viz., 10,000 Swiss, 10,000 lanceknights, and the rest Italians and French), and 1,200 men-at-arms, and a great band of artillery, with a good lieutenant and captain. At sea he is the stronger, and he has the Venetians and the Florentines as his allies.

They must not forget also to demand the delivery of the Pope, showing the Emperor as gently as possible the penalties he has by right incurred, and how justly the whole of Christendom may take action against him. Francis will not withdraw his army from Italy until his sons are restored to him. Finally, they will see the great persuasions towards peace and the restoration of his sons which Wolsey has written to the English ambassadors.

I am instructed by him to go to Venice, dissembling my purpose until I can proceed, and I am to be advertised by Cassalis and Gambara whether access can be had to the Pope; when I shall urge the protestation, but not the commission, until I receive further instructions. This Wednesday, 11 Sept., has received his letter dated at the manor of Medley, with a copy of the earl of Angus's letter, stating that Sir Wm. Lisle was never resident in Scotland within the bounds of his office, but always in the Debateable Ground. This assertion is false. Both Lisle and the Nixons are received in Scotland, chiefly within the Middle Marches, and commit daily new outrages, accompanied by the Armstrongs, Elwoolds, and Crosers. Has no confidence in Angus. None but Dand Carr, of Farnihurst, and Geo. Carr, will apply themselves to the administration of justice. All English rebels are kept within the bounds of Liddirsdale, but he can obtain no meeting for redress, except from the Carrs, whom he meets every 14 days. Has redressed all the complaints of the Scots for the Middle Marches, since the exchange of seals, except one great bill, of which he encloses a copy. Sir John Heron has given up the room of Tyndale, has offered it to divers gentlemen of the country, with a fee of 10*l.* besides profits, but can get none to take it, and is obliged to send a company of his own servants there. Is not able to defend the country in its present disorder, caused by the forthgoing of Lisle and his adherents, viz., Ogles, Fenwicks, Shaftos, Charletons, Dadds, Wilkinsons, Crischoips (?), &c. I have delivered him the protestation, with which the bishop of Bath writes me you are satisfied, and the minute of the general commission to be gained from the Pope. When the purport of that commission is well studied, it will be found that nothing can be better suited to your purpose, "with less disclosing of the matter." I have never intended to advance my own authority by it, and you will always find me a true and obedient servant, delighting in no earthly thing so much as to accomplish all your commandments. There is no earthly good that could induce me to endure the labor I hourly sustain, except "the assured trust of your gracious love and favor." I trust that all I have done in regard to master Secretary's instructions will be to your entire satisfaction. 3429. INTERVIEW OF CHARLES V. and the ENGLISH AMBASSADORS.

R. O.

1. At the request of the King their master, and for the good of peace, they beg the Emperor would accept one of the articles following, without requiring any renunciation of the duchy of Milan; viz., 1, that the duchy remain as it is at present; 2, or that the Emperor will pardon and restore Francis Sforza; or, 3, that the duchy be left in deposit in the hands of the king of England till the affair is decided. If the Emperor will accept none of these proposals, let him state what he means to do with the duchy, as he has several times declared that he and his brother of Hungary would remove out of it, and Bourbon is dead, to whom he had provisionally promised it.

2. That, in consideration of the great sums in which France is bound, both to his Majesty and to the king of England, the Emperor will consent to the deduction of the 200,000 ducats assigned in lieu of the dower of Madame Eleanor, Francis being bound in nowise to hinder the Emperor's going to Italy to take the Imperial crown. Francis offers beforehand, in lieu of the other aids, to restore to the Emperor the ships and galleys taken, which is more than equivalent. In reply,

The Emperor thanks the King and Wolsey for their efforts in behalf of peace, which he himself will promote, as he has this day replied to the ambassadors of France in presence of those of England. As the latter press for a particular answer, his Majesty, under the protestations made by him on 20 July, makes answer as follows: That if the judges whom he will appoint for the trial of Francis Sforza find that he have done nothing for which he should be deprived, the Emperor is willing to restore him according to the appointment which his Majesty despatched to him at Toledo. If, on the other hand, he is condemned, the duchy belongs to his Majesty; otherwise it would be the occasion of new wars. As to the aid of Italy, from which Francis wishes to excuse himself on the ground of impossibility, the Emperor maintains it is so reasonable that he cannot believe the French king will refuse it, especially as the said offers come of his own free will, and that the execution of that article will not be called for so soon that he should allege impossibility. The Emperor does not wish to go to Italy for a crown or for any man's injury, but only for the service of God. The aid required consists, first, of 200,000 crowns, payable as stated in the article; 2, in the aid of ships for three months from the Emperor's embarkation; 3, the pay of 6,000 foot for six months, for which the king of France is bound to give bills before the delivery of his sons; and, 4, to contribute 500 men-of-arms for six months. For the sake of the King and Wolsey the Emperor will be content,—1, to let the king of France compensate himself for the 200,000 crowns by the abatement of the like sum granted by his Majesty to the queen of France; 2, to remit to Francis the pay of the 6,000 foot for six months, which would amount to about 108,000 crowns, provided 100,000 of them be in augmentation of the dowry of the said Queen; 3, to remit the contribution of 300 men-at-arms. Thus the question of the aid will be reduced to the matter of the army by sea; and his Majesty cannot believe Francis will refuse this, having married his eldest sister. He is content that the fleet wait at the port where he shall embark only three months, and serve him other three months. By these and the other answers delivered this day it will be seen that his Majesty does not insist upon all his rights, but wishes to preserve peace and satisfy the king of England. 3430. CHARLES V. and FRANCIS I.

Conditions finally to be offered to the Emperor for a modification of the treaty of Madrid, and the restoration of the French king's sons at the intervention of England.

1. Francis offers 2,000,000 cr. of the sun in place of the duchy of Burgundy, and the counties of Macon, &c., 1,200,000 to be paid in ready money, on which the Dauphin and duke of Orleans are to be immediately liberated; the remaining 800,000 cr. to be paid to the king of England pro rata in lieu of the sum due to him by the Emperor; the balance to be paid in three yearly instalments, sureties being given to satisfy the Emperor. 2. Francis is to renounce Naples and the arrears of his pension, Milan, Genoa, Asti, Tournay, Arras, Mauritanis, St. Arnaud and Hesdin, the resort of Flanders, and the power of redeeming Lille, Douay, and Orchies. 3. Ratification of all things promised by particular states and provinces and parliaments of France, without mention of the education of the duke of Angoulême with the Emperor. 4. A defensive league, in terms of the treaty of Madrid, with an addition touching the Emperor's status. 5. Marriage of Francis and queen Eleanor, with a dote of 200,000,000 of gold cr. (aureorum), and a portion (dotalitium) equal to those of the queens of France, and the other provisions of the treaty of Madrid relative to the marriage of the Dauphin and lady Mary of Portugal. 6. Francis to furnish 12 galleys and 4 galleons for three months for the Emperor in aid of his going to Italy, to be manned at the Emperor's expense. 7. The county of Charolais, with Noyers, Chastelchinson (?), Chausson and La Perrière, the salt granaries, and 25,000 livres Tournois of the fruits received in the name of the Lady Margaret of Austria to be given up; reserving to Francis resort and homage in the said county, &c. 8. Comprehension of Venice, and, if possible, of Florence. 9. Francis to be bound to aid the Emperor against any attempts of Gueldres, Ulric de Wertheberg, or Rob. de la Marehe.

The first article to be modified with a proviso, that it be not made a pretext for the Emperor attempting anything against England. The second article, concerning freedom of trade and various other articles mentioned, which are considered to be not only reasonable, but even beyond equity and reason. If, therefore, the Emperor refuse or put off accepting them, war is to be declared against him immediately by France and England.

reciproque; and for its observance the things done before the treaty of Madrid, and since, against Genoa and other subjects of his Majesty, must be amended before the deliverance of the sons of Francis. 3. The Emperor is willing to take the 2,000,000 crowns for Burgundy, out of which the king of England shall be paid yearly that which the Emperor owes him by obligations. These and the jewels which his Grace hath in pawn, to be at the same time delivered to the Emperor, and the remainder of the 2,000,000 to be paid to his Majesty the instant the children are delivered;—for which deliverance a day and place shall be arranged. 4. If other things be fulfilled, the Emperor will relent to the King in this matter. 5. There is no occasion to make any new mention of the rachapt of Lisle, Douay, and Orchiers, seeing that the Emperor persists, in his answer of 20 July, on the fulfilment of the 5th article of the treaty of Madrid. The Emperor insists that the renunciations of the duchy of Milan by the French king shall abide in full force; and that such writings as shall be made unto his Majesty, as declared in the said article, be delivered on the same day as the sons of Francis are liberated, and the part of the duchy that has been occupied be restored. 6. The Emperor consents to mutual defence of dignities, &c., provided there be added the estate of Genoa, county of Asti, and Milan, and that the French king be bound to assist the Emperor to defend them, and the state of the duke Francis Sforza, if it be found he ought to have investiture. 7. The articles of the marriage between Francis and Madame Eleanor and of the Dauphin are so honorable that they need not be amended; only on the deliverance of the said Queen the same day that his sons are delivered, Francis should be bound to make letters of assignation of the "dot" of 200,000 crowns. No change need be made about Masconnoys, &c. succeeding to the first son; but if the Queen have no children, they should return to the Emperor; nevertheless these counties shall hang in suspense, "as to the first of Burgoyne is answered in the 20th article of the answers of July." The Emperor insists on ratifications, for reasons there mentioned. He is willing to increase the "dot" by 100,000 crowns, which the French king owes by the 23rd article of the treaty of Madrid, for the aid of 6,000 pays of foot. To articles 21 and 22 the Emperor agrees. The 23rd he thinks so reasonable that Francis should not refuse it, especially as his going to Italy is only for his crowns and not to injure any one. As to article 24, for the indemnity against the king of England, the term of the re-delivery of the bonds which the King has of the Emperor should be at the deliverance of the sons of Francis. The Emperor agrees to the 25th, for war against the Heretics. As Francis consents to the 26th, about the late duke of Bourbon, the Emperor requires a sentence passed against him since his death to be annulled. An addition to be made to the 27th touching prisoners. The 28th to 31st are all reasonable. The 32nd, touching De Charloys, should remain as it is. The 43rd should be made more explicit touching the Venetians and the Florentines. As to the 44th, ratifications should be exchanged before the liberation of the sons of Francis, and the Dauphin should also ratify. Further provisions ought to be made that Francis reimburse the Emperor for the expenses of this war since the treaty of Madrid. Francis should repay the duke of Ferrara the money he lent him, on the deliverance of his sons. A day should be appointed to redress things done in prejudice to the treaty of Madrid. The new treaty should be concluded within 40 days from this, and the French army should withdraw from Italy 30 days afterwards, the French king being bound to pay the Emperor 150,000 crowns a month so long as it remains after the expiration of the said 30 days. The king of England should be conservator of the peace according to the answer of 20 July, and a treaty be made for mutual defence between the Emperor, Francis and England, as principal centralents, as in the capitulation of London in the year 19; the stipulations to be under the censures before my lord Legate of 1527.

England, "unto whom all the commonwealth of Christendom is obliged for the benefit of this peace," to be confirmed anew before the Pope.

St. P. vii. 4.

The various towns in the Low Countries have passed an ordinance refusing the admission of English cloths, which is like to prove great injury to England. This has stimulated greatly the manufacturers of cloths in those parts, and Spanish and other wools are also in demand. Calais is very inconvenient to the merchants for a staple. iii. 4.

Are much concerned at the Pope's imprisonment, and the peril of the Church, for which they have ordered prayers and fasts to be instituted in England and France, and have addressed remonstrances to the Emperor, and implored the assistance of Henry and Francis. Are to confer together further at Compiègne how to procure the Pope's liberation; otherwise it is to be feared that the Emperor will rob the Church, and keep the cardinals in prison at his pleasure. Protest that if he do, the free cardinals will not recognise acts done under compulsion, or any cardinals created by the Pope during his imprisonment. Signed: T. Car^{us} Ebor., legatus—L. Er. Ep. p. 1839.

Is grieved to hear from the archbishop of Canterbury that Erasmus thinks he is in danger. In my tender years, when I first knew you, I entertained for you no slight regard; and this has been daily augmented by the honorable mention you have made of me in your writings. Now, seeing the unwearied labours which you have suffered in the cause of Christianity, I am desirous of succoring your pious efforts, for I have myself felt for some years the same desire of restoring the faith and religion of Christ to its pristine dignity, and repelling the impious attacks of the heretics, that the Word of God may run on purely and freely. But such is the infelicity of the times, and the prostration of good manners, that all things degenerate. I am anxious for your safety, lest, if you were removed, heresy should advance with greater danger and greater cruelty. I remember you used to say that England should be your refuge in your old age. I shall consider your conversation and advice as a great advantage; and we will, with united efforts, advance the Gospel of Christ. Oxford, 18 Sept.

desiring his most cordial recommendations to your Highness. I arrived at Boulogne this day, between 10 and 11, where I received letters from Francis and my Lady, which I send, announcing the capture of Alexandria, and other exploits to the detriment of the Imperialists, through whose discomfiture the Pope will be restored. The Emperor is pressed in Naples by Renzo de Ceri, and will be compelled to accept the terms offered by France, especially if it be true that the Wayvoda has killed Don Ferdinand; by which means, the Emperor being left destitute, the princes of the Empire may elect a new king of the Romans, or else a new Emperor, for repressing Luther, and bringing Germany into better order and obedience. Monday I shall be at Guisnes for viewing your house, and on Tuesday at Calais. Boulogne, 21 Sept. Signed.

"Je passay h m'en vins coucher à Plebe de Cayre" (Pieve del Cairo), and today at Ochobiano. Yesterday had a dispute with the ambassadors of the Signory, "et d[ic]ue de Milan," who had promised artillery and pioneers as soon as he was on the Ticino, but he can get nothing from them. Told them of the great expense he had incurred in bringing the King's artillery and 600 pioneers hither, besides the additional number that was necessary for the taking of Bosen and Alexandria. Demanded from them at least 3,000 pioneers and a good number of guns, but saw plainly that he will not get sufficient. Novara and Vigefve (Vigevano) and all Lomelina have surrendered to him. Has put them into the hands of the Duke. This is no small present to him from the King. Assures him it would be better if the conquest was made for himself, and the country would be more content. Asks to know his pleasure. Wishes him to tell the Venetian ambassador in France, that of the 15,000 men they are bound to supply in Romagna and here, there are not half in the field; and also to tell the ambassador of the duke of Milan that, in return for all the places which the King gives him, he must provide a larger force than before. Ochobiano, 21 Sept.

Is just now informed that of the 7,000 men whom the Signory are bound to have here, instead of 5,500, the number which their ambassador said was present, there are but 3,000 or 4,000, and there is no provision being made of artillery.

Communication from the Emperor's council to the ambassadors of France and England, at Palencia, 20 Sept. 1527.

The Emperor's ambassadors shall say, that, considering the Emperor has given up much to which he has a right by the treaty of Madrid, as appears by the answers given to the French and English ambassadors on Saturday last, he does not doubt that the King their master will conclude peace according to these answers without further delays. As to the doubt which the other ambassadors put forward concerning the defence of Milan, the aid of ships for the voyage to Italy, and the withdrawal of the French army in Italy before the delivery of the Princes, they must know that their master has renounced Milan, as he now renounces Genoa and Asti; that he promised the ships without being asked; and it would not be reasonable to keep an army in Italy after the conclusion of the peace, as it would only occasion distrust and a new war. The reciprocal reparation of damages can be arranged while treating. The request of the French that the Emperor should give up the 100,000 cr. in lieu of 6,000 pays for the Italian expedition is unreasonable, but he will accept the sum in augmentation of his sister's dowry. Concerning Masconois, Auxerrois, Bar-sur-Seine, and the aid to be given to the Emperor at the death of Charles of Gueldres, Francis has already promised. Think that the Emperor, for the sake of peace, will be content to please the French king touching the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon, the prisoners, the sovereignty of Charolois, the 25,000 francs to Madame, and the payment to the duke of Ferrara.

If the renunciation of Milan, and the other points to which Francis is pledged, are performed, the Emperor will make such reply concerning the remainder of the two millions that it will be seen not to be his fault if the peace is not concluded.

The French and English ambassadors desired the Imperial Council of State to repeat the above in the name of his Majesty; and on Saturday, Sept. 21, made the same request to him. Having heard the report of his Council, and seen the writing, he approved of it.

The ambassadors then asked the Emperor to declare the terms and sureties which he desired for the remainder of the two millions. He proposed the delivery, as hostages, on the liberation of the Princes, of Messrs. de Vendome, St. Pöl, Longueville, Guise, Cantrech (sic, q. Lautrec?), Laval, de Bretagne, the count of Dunois, the prince of Tallemont, Mons. de Rieux, the Grand Master, Montmorency, the Admiral, sieur de Boyon, and the heir of the late bastard of Savoy. 2. The Emperor desires the following alterations in the articles of the treaty:—

In place of the 3rd, the French king shall be bound to pay for his ransom 1,500,000 cr. of the sun, by certain instalments, the Queen and the Dauphin to be given as hostages.

In the 5th, the county of Ast is to be excepted, as being the ancient patrimony of the house of Orleans.

The 6th article shall be limited to those lands which form the Emperor's patrimony.

A portion of the 21st article shall be omitted, as Mons. de Gheldres is related to and has served the French crown.

The 22nd article about the Emperor's voyage into Italy shall be reformed in accordance with the league between the Pope, French king, Venice, and others.

By the 26th article, Bourbon shall not be allowed to return to France, but his rents shall be paid to him.

By the 28th article, Milanese exiles shall be reinstated. The 22nd (32nd?) article, touching the sovereignty of Charolois, shall be struck out. In the 44th, a passage is to be inserted concerning the treaty between the kings of England and France.

Articles concerning the delivery of the King, and other matters, which are now useless, are to be struck out.

2. It appears by the report of the ambassadors of both Princes that the whole affair depends upon four points:—1. On the security to be given for the 400,000 crowns necessary to complete the 2,000,000 for the redemption [of Francis]; for which the Emperor demands, as hostages, the dukes of Vendome and Longueville, the counts of St. Pål and Guise. It is agreed that, without renewal of previous offers, there be offered for the redemption of Francis 2,000,000, of which 1,200,000 crowns shall be paid in ready money, provided that the Dauphin and the duke of Orleans be delivered at the same time. This to be within two months after the agreement has come to the knowledge of Francis. The debts of the king of England to be paid out of the remainder, and the bonds restored. For the remainder, security shall be offered, first in bonds of merchants and bankers, or, if that is not satisfactory, in possession of the lands of the duke of Vendome, and his mother, in Flanders and the Emperor's dominions. If that offer too be rejected, the Emperor shall be offered the sale of the said lands with power of redemption; thirdly, the same security which was given to the king of England for Tournay; and, finally, if nothing else will satisfy him, the bond of the king of England, who is willing to make himself principal debtor for Francis if the latter do not pay.

2. Francis is willing to procure the required renunciation of the dukedom of Milan to the Emperor; from whom, however, it is important to obtain, if possible, that indifferent judges shall be appointed for the trial of Francis Sforza, and that if he be acquitted he shall be restored. If the Emperor insists on restitution of cities taken since the treaty of Madrid, he shall be told that this is unreasonable; but that if Sforza be declared guilty, Francis will assist the Emperor to keep him out of the duchy in any manner that they may agree upon, and will give up possession of Genoa and Pavia and Asti to the Emperor immediately after the liberation of his sons with the same security as is provided for the revocation of the army from Italy.

3. The offers about the galleys shall be renewed that the Emperor may keep them for three months, and Francis will restore to the Emperor eight galleys just taken at Portofin.

4. If Francis were to recall his own army from Italy it would be most injurious both to him and the confederates, but it may be recalled on the liberation of his children, and he will promise to do so as soon as possible, within a time to be limited after that event; the king of England promising that if the security of Princes is not sufficient, Francis shall place in the hands of Henry certain young noblemen as security, and shall pay a fine of 300,000 crowns, for which the hostages shall remain. It is agreed that the Venetians and Florentines be comprehended without prejudice of debts due by the Emperor and the king of Hungary, else a form of comprehension shall be accepted such as the Emperor lately desired.

If the Emperor refuse to accept any of these offers, war shall be declared by both Kings without delay. Signed by Montmorency.

3453. LEE and POYNTZ to [HENRY VIII.]

Report briefly the point in which affairs now stand, referring further to their letters to Wolsey. The Emperor holds out for these points chiefly:
1. The renunciation of Milan imperpetuum. He will give Sforza indifferent judges, and renounces the duky for himself, but not for his brother the king of Hungary. 2. He insists on the recall of Lautrec's army from Italy before the pledges are delivered. 3. He demands the galleys and ships for his passage to Italy according to the treaty of Madrid. 4. Although he declares himself willing to take 1,200,000 in ready money, and sureties for the rest of the 2,000,000, he declines to take any merchants' or bankers', saying, if he took his own subjects they might be swindled; if the French king's, he would be in danger of never having his money. He requires hostages that may remain till the money is paid, whose names are in "the second answer of reformation," which we send. You will see he demands no beggars. Could not get him to be more reasonable. He is willing to let the Venetians and Florentines be comprised if they do to him what is right. They have spoken with him, and a book of his demands has been delivered to the Venetian ambassador, which we hope now to send you. He asks, for one thing or another, 520,000 ducats, and restitution of two or three cities which they have taken, the Ambassador says, to the use of Francis Sforza, though the Emperor says to their own, as Sforza is in their hands not able to maintain an army. Of the Florentines he asks 300,000 ducats for expenses of the war. On the 25 Sept. he told the Venetian and Florentine ambassadors to write for sufficient powers, and they should find him reasonable.

When De Turenne told the Emperor that Francis would give what hostages seemed reasonable to Henry, he said when he had heard the French king's answer he would hear your Highness. Palencia, 27 Sept. 1527. Signed.

R. O.

Supposes that my lord Almoner writes to Wolsey of the harsh response ("asperum ambassatam") given to his servant by Alaman, viz., that the Emperor would not condescend to any other proposals, &c. Thinks this must be owing to news from Hungary giving them hope of speedy success in Italy; if not, it is a device caused by their fears for Italy. This was not so apparent at the first conference, because, as I am informed, they supposed I carried some special proposal (pecuhare). Being told that the Papal ambassador had said to one of this city that the Pope had much need of his prayers, went to see if I could discover anything. I gather from his words that the Pope will be liberated upon conditions, or the delay will be imputed to the Viceroy, who had advised the Pope to come to Naples for the Emperor's security. To this his Holiness replied that he would not unless he were dragged thither.

Wrote as commanded to Johannes Jacobus (Tibaldi) about not giving up the sons of Francis before the fulfilment, &c. If any success come from the Archduke, people are disposed to hope that Lautrec has few men, and they are not inclined during the negotiations to recede from the terms offered.

Breton shall also say to the Great Master that the surrender of Milan, demanded by the Emperor, is not in the King's power, as it has been newly conquered and placed in the hands "de ceulx," to take it from whom by force would be contrary to the treaty, would make his friends his enemies, consume his army, and waste the present season. The King will, however, surrender to the Emperor, immediately on the liberation of his children, the town of Genoa and the county of Ast, and all his claims to the duchy of Milan. "Et semble bien audit Sieur que ledit Empereur se doit contenter de ce que dessus error, que le dit sieur Roy luy tiendra la promesse, veu que toutes les nest seulement que pour recouvrer sesdits enfans et dem voudroit fier en cest endroit diceulx sieur Roy vouloir a la dite faicte pure et simple payer audit Empereur ce que par raison toutefois quil ny ait rien quil puisse retarder la [delivrance desdits] enfans."

You must do everything in your power to bring the Cardinal to our service; for, his deeds in France being now accomplished, it seems to us that he cannot well refuse to act towards us as he has acted towards the French. You will therefore make him, in our name, the following offers:—1st, the payment of all arrears on his several pensions, amounting to 2,000 ducats yearly. 2ndly, 6,000 more ducats until such a time as a bishopric or other ecclesiastical endowment of the same revenue becomes vacant in our kingdoms. 3rdly, in addition to the above payments, amounting to a considerable sum of money, for we calculate that his pension has not been paid for five whole years, we shall order the Duke, who is to have Milan, to give him a marquise in that duchy, with an annual rent of 12,000 ducats, or even 15,000, should you consider the above sum insufficient. The said marquise to be possessed by the Cardinal during his life, and to pass after him to any of his heirs that he shall appoint.

The whole of which we promise to the said Cardinal, if he will only act as he has done on previous occasions, to the advantage and profit of the King his master and our own. 30 Sept. 1527.

2. Instructions to the Grand Master and president de Biron, sent by Francis I. to England.

1. They are to present letters of credence to the King and Wolsey; to declare the affection borne towards them by Francis; and to thank them for their good offices in the recovery of Francis's children, a service which he will never forget. The King may be sure that he will at all times find Francis ready to do him any service. They are also to thank the King for sending Wolsey to France, who has managed affairs so well, and to say that they had been sent to obtain the ratification of the peace and other treaties made between Francis and the Cardinal, and to witness the oath taken thereupon. On the capitulation of the privileges of the English merchants in Flanders it will be necessary to see the originals, and ascertain if the English enjoyed them before the war. The reason Francis wishes them to have similar privileges in France is, for fear the Flemings would deprive them of them by reason of the war, and he thinks the privileges in France should be conditional on their being withheld in Flanders.

As to the clause by which Francis is bound to supply 1,000 men for maritime war, and England 500, if they can make it anything better they may do so; at least they must not make it worse. They shall do their best to obtain two months more for the pay of the foot soldiers for Italy for November and December. They shall obtain the ratifications both of the treaties made with the Cardinal, and of that which was delivered to him at Ardes. The Grand Master, who is one of the knights of the Order, shall present to the king of England the decree by which he has been elected a brother of the Order of St. Michael, and shall deliver to him, on his acceptance of it, the collar and mantle, taking his oath, with the limitations necessary to him as chief of the Order of the Garter, which Order he shall request the King to send to Francis, so that these two Princes may henceforth wear one collar. "Ex Roma a D. Laurentio Rodulpho ad Cardinalem Rodulphum, die secunda Octobris."

The Germans have re-entered Rome, and will not leave it unless they are paid 150,000 ducats. They have so terrified the people that their demands are in part listened to, and when they could not get ready money they have demanded hostages for security. The Pope is very indignant, and has resolved with his cardinals neither to give hostages nor money except in their own persons. Whilst they were deliberating Alarcon made his appearance, saying that the Germans had sworn to commit some great enormity unless hostages were given them immediately. The Pope, much moved, said he would not allow it, and shed so many tears that even his enemies were compelled to pity him. Alarcon, with all his efforts and by shutting the door, could scarcely prevent the Pope from joining us as a hostage.

At last he suffered us to go. We were conducted honorably by the Spaniards, undergoing only the ceremonial punishment of being exhibited in the Campo de' Fiori, where the Germans had assembled in great tumult. Alarcon delivered us to the German band, and after we had been shown to the infantry we were taken to the house of the Picard Massatosti, who treated us with great respect. Fears this gentle treatment will not last. They directed us to urge the Pope to pay the money, that we might the sooner be liberated. We replied that we were not hostages for money but for observance of the terms made between the Pope and the Emperor, which provided that taxes should be imposed by commissioners on the states of the Church to the sum of 250,000 ducats, and that the Imperialists were bound, if necessary, to see them levied, which it was impossible to do while the Pope was a prisoner. We are reconciled to perpetual imprisonment, as only death is worse than what we have suffered already.

A general of St. Francis, who had come from Spain to the Viceroy at Gaeta, died on the 28th ult. He had written to the bishop of Verona (ad dominum Veronen.) to put the Pope in comfort, as he brought news that would dispel the darkness of the Church. Card. Colonna, who came in two days from Naples, sent word to the bishop of Verona that he came solely to kiss the Pope's foot and ask pardon for injuries.

3474. SIR CHRISTOPHER WILLOUGHBY to WOLSEY.

A decree was made by Wolsey before his departure, that the writer's sister, my lady Willoughby, should bring into Chancery all such evidences as she and the other executors of my Lord my brother had in keeping in London in Trinity term last, in order that it might be seen by the counsel on both sides what lands were entailed to heirs male, and what others to heirs general, previous to "offices" being found in every shire by the writs of diem clausit extremum. Lady Willoughby, however, brought in only a little coffer sealed, declaring that it contained all the evidences except those touching the lands of her jointure, and those mentioned in her husband's will, which she declared openly in Chancery that she would not show in court. For his own part, has obeyed Wolsey's command not to meddle in the matter until an order should be taken between himself and her, but his sister-in-law does the contrary. Mr. White and Thomas Rusche, whom Wolsey commissioned to view the goods of the late Lord in Norfolk and Suffolk, saw those that he left at the Barbican in London, and then went to Parham in Suffolk, where they found that lady Willoughby had conveyed away all the goods of her husband, including those that he had bequeathed to the writer, and heirlooms that had been there for 60 years. News from Rome brought by a person who was sent by card. Triulzi from the castle of St. Angelo to Lautrec on Oct. 7.

The general of the Franciscan order came from Spain to Rome, and told the Pope, in the Emperor's name, that he should be liberated on condition of holding a general council for the reformation of the Church. The Emperor demands, for security, during the war in Italy, Civita Castellana, Orvieto, Ferri, Bologna, and Ancona; a promise from the Pope that he will never oppose him; 12 hostages to be named by the Emperor; 200,000 crowns in two months, for the wages of the army, in addition to the 400,000 crowns granted at the first capitulation.

The Pope answered that he would agree to a council, but Christian princes must first agree with each other about the place where it shall be held. He would not promise about giving up the cities named, as he did not know whether they would be contented, and was sure they did not wish to be under Spanish rule. As to the hostages, he desired the general to name those whom the Emperor wished to have, and he would then answer. His Holiness said that he was not bound to pay the money demanded, and if he was bound to pay it, he had agreed with the Viceroy to pay it in two years, within which it was impossible.

The general, seeing the difficulties in the way of setting him free, said that he must send for the Emperor's decision on many points, and requested the Pope to ask Lautrec for a safe-conduct through France.

He thought he asked this more for the purpose of informing the Emperor of the state of his affairs here, and told Lautrec so, that he might do what he thought best. All the Imperial lanzknechts are at Rome, and it is agreed that they shall be paid $2\frac{1}{2}$ pays at once, and the three others within two months, at the rate of 30,000 crowns each pay. All the money available for the first payment is 30,000 crowns, brought by the general, and 10,000 crowns in the hands of Alarcon.

The Spaniards also refuse to leave Rome until they are paid. The lanzknechts do not exceed 4,500, and the Spaniards 2,500. The Italians number 1,500 and are outside Rome. These forces have no general, except Alarcon, who has not left the castle of St. Angelo. Don Ugo, the marquis of Guasto, and John of Urbino were in Naples. Don Ugo, who is the Viceroy's lieutenant, was ill. Alarcon and the other Imperialists are certain that on the approach of the fleet and of Lautrec's army the affairs of the Emperor will be ruined, as they can get no money. The Pope, seeing the exorbitant demands made to him, urges the army of the league to proceed, and will agree to nothing if he knows that it is doing so.

The marquis of Saluzzo has fortified Brazano for the abbot of Farfa, and the troops of Renzo and Tardes have gone thither.

R. O. I received from Wolsey a letter informing me of such letters as he had written to the French king; among others of the sharp words used by you to the Imperial ambassador touching the supposed offers made to the Emperor by the French ambassadors, and of his ambitious mind to Milan, at which Francis greatly rejoiced, and desired me to give you his hearty thanks. I have written to Wolsey. The French king desires to purchase certain horses in England, he is so delighted with those you sent him. Saulys,

"Ex literis magnifici domini Hieronimi Lasco diei xii. Augusti."

The said Hieronymus had joined Radych, the captain of the King's light horse, at the castle of Lippa, with 4,000 horse and as many foot. The King had entered Moravia, a duchy of Ferdinand, with 15,000 horse and foot; and if he did not meet him, he would send Lasco and Radych to enter Austria in another direction, which country he intended to enter himself.

From letters from Hungary, 24 Sept.

The Palatine, Ferdinand's lieutenant, had sent Andrea Bathori with German foot and the cavalry of the Palatine, the archbishop of Gran, and the bishop of Vesprim to intercept Sigismund Literatus, late governor (procurator) of Varadin, whom the bishop of Varadin had sent with cavalry to the King. He met and attacked them, killing about 2,000. Bathori fled with a few survivors to the castle of Therebes, and was there besieged by Sigismund.

Letters of Oct. 3 state that the King's forces have gained a great victory near Cassovia, which they are besieging. Johannes Bansi, the King's lieutenant in Slavonia, writes on the Sunday after St. Augustine's day that the King was marching towards Moravia, and that he and other nobles were in arms expecting orders.

Ferdinand has returned to Vienna from Bohemia, where he held a diet, but without obtaining what he wanted. From the Germans he asked 5,000 foot, but it is not known whither he would send them. He is pressed for money by the duke of Brunswick, whom he sent into Italy with a band of Germans, but never paid, and the Duke threatens to take up arms to recover his due.

Received letters from Croatia of Oct. 12, that Ferdinand had sent 8,000 Germans to the castle of Uduigna, which belongs to the Turks, on the frontier of Carinthia; but they missed their way, and were surrounded and cut to pieces by 16,000 Turks between Labacum and Methlica, and the survivors had fled to the latter place. The prefect of Bosna had made several inroads towards Labacum, and done great damage.

"Ex literis D. Gregorii, die . . . Octobris, Placentiæ datis."

Count Galeazzo Tasson has returned to the camp from the Du[ke], saying that the Duke will serve the League, and desires the ambassadors to come to him. We shall go to Ferrara in two days, taking cardinal Cibo with us, and procuring for him the authority of other cardinals. Joachim has come hither, and will go to Venice to treat concerning the lances to be granted to the marquis of Mantua. A nobleman has been sent to urge the Pope not to accept any terms from the Imperialists, nor to give them money. Cardinal Far[nese] has gone to Parma to collect money for the army. News has come that two standards sallied out of Milan against 300 of our foot at Biagrassa. The Venetians could not assist them, and Lautrec sent a few Gascons, Germans, and Italians to their aid. Fears this may delay our journey for six days. Heard afterwards that what was reported by the Imperialists was merely to cause fear, and if so, we shall go the sooner to Rome.

3497. SIR GREGORY CASALE to [WOLSEY].

Heard from Lautrec of the passing of Dr. Chinit (Knight), who has gone 10 miles further. Lautrec thought he brought money, but Casale assured him that he came on spiritual affairs. Wrote to ask him to wait at Parma or Piacenza, and sent letters of introduction for him to some of his own relations, and to the Cardinal of Mantua. Will assist him as much as possible.

Since his last letter, has been practising with the Swiss, who say they agreed to serve in the duchy of Milan, and refuse to go elsewhere. Those who have returned from the fortresses in Tuscany have joined them and caused great famine and disease. Guido, count Rangoni, and Casale have made them great promises, and appeased them with difficulty. Besides this, they have embezzled 4,000 pays. The French king will now see the truth of the advice given him about the Swiss and Germans.

As Lautrec says, they have been twice paid, and we do not know that they are anywhere else than at Brescia, and beyond Savoy. This delay will cause the Pope to agree with the Imperialists, unless the influence of the Cardinals prevents it. Has heard of the death of the Viceroy from many places, especially from the archbishop of Capua, who was present. Wolsey may consider it a judgment of God. Cardinal Colonna has kissed the Pope's feet, and shows himself most friendly to the college. The Colonnas have intimated to Lautrec that they will gladly come to an agreement with the French king, as the Emperor does not recognise their deserts. Lautrec has given a favorable answer in general terms. The Florentine ambassador has spoken privately with Casale on the subject. Asks Wolsey to advise the French king not to despise their request, for it will ensure our victory. The duke of Milan has come to try and persuade Lautrec to proceed against Milan. The Venetians write constantly of the irruption of the Germans, and of the success of the king of Bohemia in Hungary. Lautrec remains constant, and would have started for Rome tomorrow, if the Swiss had not prevented it. Every one blames Casale for advising Lautrec to go to Rome, saying that he does so because he wishes to return to his own country. Lautrec sends the bearer through France to urge the French king and Wolsey to hasten the contribution, and desired Casale to assure Wolsey of his intention to proceed to Rome. The fleet is ready, and Andrea Doria will now set out with 2,200 foot, as there is no means of getting money to provide more.

Langeais will return tomorrow to Genoa, and order the sailing of the fleet. Has sent persons to him to levy 1,000 foot for the Tuscan fleet. Rentzi will come shortly to levy 3,000 foot, but there will be no money at Genoa; and nothing will be done unless Wolsey persuades the French king to send some. Money could be got from the Genoese if the Fregosi were given up to them, and also from the people of Savoy, if they were promised freedom.

Lautrec will send him to Ferrara in two days. Has written to the Signory to despatch an ambassador thither. Has not much hope in the Duke. Pavia, 15 Oct. 1527. Signed.

3498. SIR GREGORY CASALE to ———

The duke of Ferrara has sent his ambassador, and says the matters proposed to him about Naples are too weighty for him; that he is very glad of the affinity to be contracted in France, but can do nothing in the matter until freed, as he hopes soon to be, from his obligations to the Emperor. The Ambassador urges me to go to the Duke, who will do much for the King. Yesterday the Venetian ambassador and I spoke freely to Lautrec, advising him to declare for the confederates, especially as he was going with his army into their territories, and that if the duke of Ferrara would not come over to us the College of Cardinals would order Lautrec, as captain general, to storm Modena and Reggio, which are cities of the Church. This was intimated today to the Duke's ambassador, who was sent to his master with an offer that, if he would declare himself for the confederates, France, Venice, and the Florentines would get the Pope to secure him in the possession of the state he now has, and that the investiture of the duchy should be given him.

We must get him to resolve at once that our army may know what to do, else we shall get nothing from him but words; but now he is in evil case we could, in two days, overrun all his territory by water. Lautrec awaits the Ambassador's return before determining whether I shall go to Ferrara. Have not yet left Pavia, as part of the Swiss are unpaid, and will not go forward.

R. O.

Three or four days after the capture of Pavia the Swiss mustered, and, as usual on such occasions, demanded double wages. When urged to go to Rome they said they would either remain or go home. Lautrec assembled a council, and with difficulty persuaded 2,000 of them to go on. They did the same after the taking of Alexandria, when all but 2,000 went home. Others, who had two months' wages on their arrival here, mustered the very next day, and demanded a third month's wages before they had done an hour's service. Pay was given for 6,000 men, though there appeared to be only 5,000 at the musters. Often called upon Lautrec about the galleys to be sent to Naples, but he said it was not his business. Langenis, however, has been here (as he believes Wolsey knows), and gone to Genoa about it. Signor Gregory had paid 52,000 crowns of the King's money, before his arrival, without his consent. Has agreed to his paying the rest, considering Lautrec's determination to advance to Rome. — 15 Oct.

St P. iv. 478.

Received by Magnus Wolsey's letters on his departure for France. Have discharged such of my lord of Richmond's servants as could be spared. Since then Sir Will. and Humph. Lisle have escaped from prison at Newcastle, and have committed outrages in concert with the Armstrongs. They and Will. Shaftoo were indicted at Newcastle at the last assizes; of which the King's attorney took up copies to show the King and Wolsey. Have caused them to be proclaimed traitors all through the three Marches. The Duke has written to the king of Scots and Angus for their apprehension, and has always received good answers, but nothing has come of it. Meanwhile the Lisles continue their outrages in Northumberland, and encourage others. Have therefore caused Sir Will. Eure to remove from Harbottle to Felton, a lordship of Lisle's, to which he and his son much resort, with 30 or at least 24 horsemen of Berwick, and a company of his own, at 4*d.* a day for two months, out of the Duke's coffers. They will burn certain houses within the woods at Felton, and carry off the corn, hay, and victuals, and send to jail at Newcastle certain "women and other simple persons" who have been their spies. A watch will also be provided at Newton, near the bishopric of Durham, another place of Lisle's. Think Eure can do no better service, though he is sheriff of Northumberland, vice-warden of the Middle Marches, and keeper of Tyndale and Riddisdale. "Ex literis D. Gregorii die xix. Octobris ex S. Johanne datis."

The army have at last crossed the Po, and we are now in St. John's, within the States of the Church (in loco, scilicet, ecclesia). Difficulties have arisen from want of provisions, for which I am obliged to go to Piacenza. Lautrec magnifies his forces, and it is needful to treat the horsemen well. Cardinal Farnese and others are at Piacenza, awaiting some good success. They have given the news from Rome, dated from the Castle, 7 Oct., which I send you. Count Galeazzo has come to the camp, sent by the duke of Ferrara, but he brings only a general promise that the Duke will not assume the offensive. The Count says the Duke is so devoted to Henry that he will do nothing without his knowing it, and he wished he could interpose the King's authority in everything. He wished I would go thither, which I refused, seeing that the Duke only gave a general answer. He said the Duke was afraid that Francis, to recover his sons, would give up Italy for ever to the Emperor. I replied, that Francis was bound to treat of peace only in conjunction with the King, with whom these negotiations had been carried on for the Pope's liberation; that he must be aware of the value of the King's support; and that he ought to fear the greatness of the Emperor, more than he dislikes the captivity of his sons. Nothing shall be omitted to bring the Duke over to our side; for if that be done, the Germans can be kept out of Naples without fighting. Lautrec told the duke of Ferrara's agent that he might, with honor to himself, and without offence to the Emperor, join the League, lest our army should destroy his duchy.

The Venetians are so enraged that we have not gone to Milan, that they are making no due preparations; and their army of 12,000 foot, which was to remain in this state, is reduced to 3,000. Meanwhile the Pope prays for our coming on bended knees, and will die of grief if this opportunity be let slip. Hopes, however, that the Venetians will do their duty with a stouter heart than before. You see in what bad condition the Imperialists are. I was afraid the Pope would make a bargain with them, but their dishonorable demands have removed all fear of that; and if the French king will urge on his army diligently, all will be well.

Is desired by Lautrec to write that, instead of the army of the Venetians being 7,000, and the duke of Urbino's 8,000, their joint number is not more than 4,000. The Venetians are also bound to pay half the Swiss here resident, of whom there were 7,000, but all have left except 2,000. They ought, therefore, to be the more willing to fulfil their treaty. Lautrec hopes that Wolsey will speak to the Venetian ambassador about it. He is eager to go on to Rome, even more for the rescue of the Pope than for the French king's command, and the rescue of his children. Plesance, 19 Oct. Signed.

Commission of Henry VIII. to Arthur Plantaginet, viscount Lysle, John Taylour, LL.D., archdeacon of Buckingham, vice-chancellor, Sir Nic. Carewe, master of the stable, Sir Ant. Browne, and Sir Thos. Wriothesley, Garter king-at-arms, to signify to Francis I. his election into the Order of the Garter, to place the collar on his neck, to present him with the mantle, garter, and statutes, and to take his oath according to the said statutes. If he does not wish to take the oath, his simple word will be sufficient. Greenwich, 22 Oct. 1527. Has been informed by the "said" personage, who is very familiar with the vice-chancellor of Flanders, the cardinal of Liège, and De Berghe, that some persons in England who favor the Emperor are intriguing against the King and Cardinal because the King is putting away his wife, the Emperor's aunt, which, they say, will make it impossible ever to reconcile the Emperor to Henry; and if the latter were dead, they could re-marry the Queen or her daughter to some prince of England, who would make perpetual alliance with the Emperor against the king (Francis).

Wolsey will have learned the state of affairs by the last letters of his colleagues from Paredes, which he doubts not Wolsey has received, as "Dom. Brun" wrote to him on the 9th that he had sent them on. Nothing has since occurred of any moment, though he had some conversations with the Emperor and Councillors on his arrival. The Emperor seems to be much altered from the turn of affairs in Italy, and to be determined not to condescend to other conditions. Heard before his arrival that the general of

The bishop of Worcester arrived on the 13th. Have shown him the letters. On his coming to the Emperor he said, that, besides the king of England, the king of France, his mother, and his Council were all bent upon the peace; but he thought some of the demands of the Emperor were too hard to be accepted. The Emperor answered that he would abate nothing, and he murmured that the King helped against him with money, and that your Grace had "written in the destaigneng of his honor." He referred to the letter sent by you from Compiegne to the Pope. He is much altered by reason of the letter from the King, and of another from the Chancellor, left in the hands of the lady Eleanor by the French ambassadors. The Chancellor had averred that if he did not abate his conditions he must expect to make war with France and England. On hearing this he said, "They go about to constrain me," which the English ambassadors denied. Were sorry the letters were shown, and endeavored to discover if any accommodation could be made as to the points in dispute. Detail their conversation with Almain on this subject. He asserted that Sforza could not be restored without trial; and on their continuing this conversation, he asked them if they had any commission to treat thereon. On his speaking to the Emperor about the subject, he returned us for answer that the Emperor would mitigate nothing, and would only wait for the answer out of England. On their insisting that the Emperor ought to grant so small a request and listen to mercy, he asked us for our demands in writing. State the substance of it. The Chancellor affirms that the Emperor will not yield. He was much stiff that the attempts in Italy should be redressed before the restitution of the Princes. When we asked what security Francis would have if that were done, the Chancellor said he might trust the Emperor, for he never broke promise. Said that in all contracts both parties ought to be secured. How is that to be done? said he. We proposed that the pledges should be put in the King's hands, as impartial; at which he demurred; and we rejoined that the Emperor had no cause to doubt the King, for, whatever his conjunction with France, he would regard the Emperor's honor.

With the last letters which came to the French ambassadors on the 18 Oct., came also the original of Wolsey's letter to Francis from Muttrell, about the rumored overthrow and death of Don Ferdinand. Cannot tell what it was sent for.* As to the Pope, Almain believes he is delivered, as the general of Observants and Messire de Millewe came to Gnetz on the 15 Sept. The Chancellor seemed to doubt this, and we told him if his Holiness were not delivered it would be hard to excuse the Emperor now. Perceive that the French ambassadors are writing to their King to advise that war be not declared till the winter is over, that the Emperor may have no leisure to prepare. Wish to know the King and Wolsey's pleasure.

Touching Sforza, Almain asked us what security the Emperor should have of his continuing a good vassal, and paying the 600,000 ducats. We said if the Emperor forgave him, and he afterwards swerved from his allegiance, no man would take part against him sooner than the King; but when asked if the King would be bound for his debts, we said the King would not buy his restitution, and had done enough for the Emperor already in offering to discharge him of his debts, and take them of the French king. Almain thought that was done more for the sake of the French king than of the Emperor. We answered that the Emperor could not, without the King's help, have obtained 1,200,000 at once. The Nuncio said he was ordered by the Emperor to write that "as he is true king and knight, the Pope without any conditions should be delivered upon the arrival to Rome of the General and Mons. de Milleville." Since their last of the 28th Sept., sent by the French post from Palencia to Sir Anthony Browne, to be sent on to the King, have been able to proceed no further. In order to show more fully the amity between England and France, took occasion to go with the French ambassadors and see the Dauphin and his brother, then only four or five leagues from Palencia. Addressed them about the alliance, saying that the King took them for his own sons. "They were taught to thank your Highness," and desire you to continue your efforts for their deliverance. Their master, Theocrenus, an eloquent man, made answer more at length. Saw them again after supper. "Surely they be goodly children and toward, as we might, for so short a time, judge." Theocrenus could not enough praise the duke of Orleans of wit, capacity, and great will to learn, and of a prudence and gravity passing this age, besides treatable gentleness and nobleness of mind, whereof daily he avoweth to see great sparks, as may be seen in this tender age. He much passeth his brother in learning, and in manner hath overcome the rudiments of his grammar." Theocrenus said that one day, on their removal to the castle where we found them, "he called nothing of them for learning;" but the Duke, seeing him sit alone, came running to him, and said, "Ah, master, now I have you, you shall not go from me or ever you teach me my lesson." We were somewhat strangely treated on this occasion, "I think, verily, not in the Emperor's default." A guard was given us the day after our coming, who prevented any of our party speaking with the Princes' folks. Left in consequence that day, and refused to dine with the Constable, who could make no good excuse for his conduct.

At Worcester's first audience perceived the Emperor to be much altered. He refused to soften some demands, and said he had heard, though he would not believe, that the King helped his enemy with money. He was moved by letters which the French had shown to the Queen his sister, giving news of the capture of Pavia, and stating that England would make war on the Emperor if he did not come to reason. Think the letters should not have been shown, for until things are desperate we ought rather to lead than draw him.

Asked Almain, as the Emperor thought it against his honor to restore Sforza before his trial, whether he would allow him to remain in the duchy of Milan on his submission. Cannot yet write their resolution. Burgos, 24 Oct. Signed.

Eleu Bayarde arrived here 9 Dec. Went to the Emperor with the French ambassadors, and De Tarbes proposed all things comprised in their instructions. Resolved to speak nothing respecting the pardon of Sforza at first, in order to avoid divisions. The Emperor asked us if these were our last offers; and, hearing they were, said he would take advice with his council; but shortly after he sent De Prat and De Buclans to ask the French ambassadors if they had anything more to say, of which they advertised us, and determined to act in common. We augmented the offers of security for the payment of the money, and for the restitution of Genoa, &c., resolving to say nothing of Milan, urging, that, if he would pardon Sforza, there would be no necessity to restore the cities, as they were in Sforza's hands.

Describe their arrangements on this head, and the conversation of Don John Manuel on that subject, who endeavored to persuade them to urge their request of themselves, and not in conjunction with the French. They are very anxious that we should act apart, and for this purpose La Chaulx offered us the first audience, which we refused. Would in no wise consent to the Venetian ambassador, who proposed that we should follow Manuel's advice. The count of Nassau said it would not agree with the Emperor's honor that Sforza should remain, and he would not counsel him otherwise, saying, "Let the French long desire it for some other, or the King's highness for me or the duke of Suffolk." We proposed the duke of Richmond.

He said it was too small for him. There are drifts to divide us, as one of the council told De Tarteres. Will say nothing of the final instruction, that the King pro pecunia restante should become principal debtor. Buklans tells us that in a farce played before the king of England, when he took the order of St. Michael, the Emperor was called tyrant,—the Almains, Lutherans,—and De-fiance was represented. Have no answer, and are told by Buklans that we shall have tomorrow. Burgos, 26 Oct. 1527.

Since crossing the Po, and arriving here, the Spaniards, thinking that they would have gone on to Palme, 30 miles distant, issued out of Milan and besieged Beaugrace, which had been won by Lautrec, and delivered into the hands of the duke of Milan. In consequence of want of men and victuals, it soon surrendered. 300 Spaniards remained to keep it, and the rest returned to Milan. Lautrec, hearing of it, sent back count Pier de Navar with 9,000 men to retake it.

Two gentlemen from the Pope have come hither, saying that he will shortly make some appointment with the Emperor, which Lautrec says will be paying 50,000 cr. for his liberty.

He is still within S. Angelo, with certain Spaniards; the rest having left for Naples. Lautrec wishes to see him at liberty, thinking that then he would soon set free the Romans and the country of Italy. Gregoire and the other ambassadors are gone to the duke of Ferrara. Came to Dover this Monday early, but could not cross, as it was SS. Simon and Jude's day. Is told it will be dangerous to cross before Wednesday, as the weather is unstable. Was told by Carewe at Canterbury that the King marvelled he had not resigned his prebend of Westminster for Mr. Secretary (Knight?), whose servants complain that they have no place to lodge in. If he had known this, could have given them a good and honest answer. Thinks it has been contrived since he left London. Mr. Secretary had a house at Poll's Wharf, where his servants were well lodged. Remits all to Wolsey. Many of his things remain there. His study stands whole. Would be content that Mr. Secretary's servants lodged there till he or their master came home.

Promised archdeacon Styllington that he should lodge there if he liked. Asks that if he resigns he may be seen to for his building, and have some recompense. His cousin, Rob. Dakers, has sufficient proxy. Has had great expenses lately in France, and with Wolsey at Calais, "and to the Master

Went to him accordingly, more to learn news than for the letters. He rehearsed all the King's kindness to the Emperor, who by his help, he said, was in peaceable possession of Spain, and said he could not believe this new amity between England and France would endure long. Assured him it was so firmly knit, no man could break it, and said he hoped the Emperor would not be so ungrateful now as to stick at small things,—especially the pardon of Sforza. "[card]inal and chancellor at his And after the sight of your said letters secretary to the King to have his letters Vendosme in the speedy despatch of your Gra[ce] commanding me to attend and go with his [to] the court for the pursuit of the same; at w[hich] time Mons. Vendosme was not come. The King's [promise] was I should give attendance till the coming [of] Mons. de Vendosme, and that then his Grace sh[ould] give him such a commandment and speak so unto him a[th] his coming that notwithstanding his Grace's special and defence made of late your Grace's letters should take effect." Has given attendance on the Chancellor every day since then. "This present [first] day of November" was called before De Helle "cou[n]ciller?", at this town of Paris, in the King's lodging, which was in Mons. the Villeroy's house, and was told by the Chancellor, in presence of Vendosme, the seneschal of Normandy, and others, that notwithstanding the scarcity in Picardy and elsewhere in France, "which and request of restraint and delfe[n]ce parts, yet, nevertheless, the King his master p[ro]mised for the great love, favor, and amity towards your [Grace] that ye should not only have now the provision of my[ste] according to your letters, but also have at your pleasure more out of his realm, 600 or 700 mewy[te]s freely, without paying custom or toll." He hopes Wolsey will be content, "considering the great necessity and clamor of the i[n]habitants and governors," that the restraint remain vaild against all others having [no] licence. "And as [to] the attache of 200 my[ste]s I have taken the sa[me] of Mons. de Vendosme, the which I shall make d of lading with all diligence."

Wolsey should write to the Council if he will accept the grant in this form, and to have 300 in Picardy, 200 in Normandy and 300 in Brittany. If so, he will provide for his whole [household] and the made to Anthony Vyvald and others, while the poor men will thank him for so relieving them from the covetousness of strangers. The clamor for the restraint arose from some of Vyvald's men sent by the city of London, "a[s] the Chamberlain's son, John Garyway and Blak of Lo[ndon]," who have so bruited that the measure of St. Walery's is raised from 30 to 50 sols Tournois, and the people expect it to rise to 60.

At all his meetings with the Council the Cardinal and De Vendosme have expressed the greatest anxiety to satisfy Wolsey. Is informed that it will be impossible to get more wheat out of France except by means of Wolsey, the country is so sore against it. Will delay making further suit till he hear from Wolsey. 3547. SIR ANTHONY BROWNE to HENRY VIII.

According to his last letters has been with the French king, who, on being informed of the coming of the ambassadors with the order, was not a little joyful, and said that he never received anything with better goodwill; that for the most part he would not fail but wear it, and that he was assured the Burgundians were as displeased therewith as any people could be; that it would discourage all his enemies to maintain war against him, and that the whole realm of France were for ever bound to Henry. He could not express all his gratitude, nor can the writer do justice to the manner in which he spoke. Paris, All Souls' day. Signed.

3548. SIR ANTHONY BROWNE to [WOLSEY].

Same as the above, with addition of the following paragraphs:—

"[Last night late arrived here Monsr. Caillion's elder brother [come] out of Italy, and brought me a letter from Sir Robt. Jernyngham [addressed] to your Grace, the which I send herewith. Newes out of these parts know I noon, but I intend to be with the King tomorrow, and [if I hear] of any, I wol thereof certifie your Grace as shortly as I may."

The secretary of Venice, who dined to-day with y told him that the duke of Ferrara is now on the side of the English and French kings, and has pro[mised] Lautrec to send his son and heir to the French king, and that his said son will marry Madame Reyny. Does not give much credit to it. The King has come hither to levy money from his commons. Encloses a packet of letters to Wolsey sent by the Legate. Paris, All Souls' day. Signed.

3549. SIR ANTHONY BROWNE to WOLSEY.

Has received two packets of letters: one from Master Almoner and Master Poyntz in Spain, sent to Brian Tuke, in which he is informed are contained letters to the King and Wolsey; the other from count Carpi to Wolsey. Has not yet heard of the coming of the King's ambassadors, nor whether they have arrived on this side the sea. My Lady, the King's mother, expected they would have been here before this, and two of the French king's order have gone to meet them. The one is Monsieur le Druess, the other the Grand Esquire. Paris, 3 Nov.

P.S.—Has just received letters from Sir Rob. Jerningham to the King and Wolsey, which he forwards. Signed.

3550. ITALY.

News related by one who left the castle of St. Angelo on the 3rd November.

The Pope had made an agreement with the Imperialists, and they had sent to Don Hugo for a ratification, which was expected in six days. The Pope is to give the lanceknights 35,000 ducats for one payment, and the same sum after they leave the city. He is to give the Spaniards 40,000 ducats, which are to be raised in Rome, and 240,000 ducats a month for four months; 50,000 ducats to the lanceknights for three months. The benefices of the kingdom of Naples are to be sold for 600,000 ducats, which sum is to be divided between the Pope and the Emperor; out of the Emperor's half the Pope is to be reimbursed the 40,000 ducats a month which he pays the Spaniards. The Imperialists wished to have carried off the cardinals Campeggio, Trulzi, and Pisa because they would not agree to this treaty. The Pope is not to favor the confederates, or to interfere in the affairs of Milan. They demanded a tenth with a crusade in Spain, and the creation of four cardinals, who offered 100,000 ducats, but the Pope refused. Certain forces were to leave the city that day on the way to Viterbo, to fight our army. The Pope had made a secret protest that all he had done was under compulsion, in order to obtain his liberty.

Their last letters informed him of the affairs in the North; how Sir Wm. Lisle, his son Humfrey, Shafto, and their adherents, are assisted in Scotland, to the great damage of Northumberland; that, by advice of justice Fitzherbert and Mr. Lister, Sir Wm. Lisle and others are indicted of treason, and proclaimed traitors on the Marches; that the country has been forbidden to assist them, and has been ordered to be ready, according to the statute of Winchester, to rise and repress them. Notwithstanding this, the outlaws, who number nearly 100, and include some of the Fenwikes, Ogilles, and Shaftoes, continually rob and spoil in Northumberland, and have lately come to Hexham and taken 24 prisoners, the king's tenants. Have ordered Sir Wm. Eure to leave Harbottell and lie at Felton, a lordship of Lisle's, whither he often repairs, and have promised him 4*d.* above their wages for 30 of his servants and 30 soldiers from Berwick, but he refuses to do so without orders from the King or Wolsey. He is vice-warden and lieutenant of the Middle Marches, sheriff of Northumberland, and keeper of Tynedale and Riddisdale, but he does not consider himself able to put good rule in the country; none of the gentlemen will do anything for him, for he does not trust them, and they bear no favor to him. The duke of Richmond has written often to the king of Scots and to the earl of Angus for the apprehension of Lisle, according to the treaty. Have always had pleasant answers, but nothing has been done. They are assisted in Scotland, and the Scotch daily ride with them to do harm in England. Do not see what can be done, except by the power of some nobleman lying continually in Northumberland, if the Scots would cease their help. Are in perplexity, and wish to know what to do.

There is great dearth of grain, and many poor people are likely to starve. Wheat is 24*s.* a quarter, and more likely to rise than fall. Nicholas Rudd, of Apulby, who was ordered by Wolsey to abide by their decision in his matter with Baynebrigg, has not appeared, and three attachments have been sent out, but to no effect. Believe he has gone to London. Ask Wolsey, if Rudd comes before him, to order him so that it shall not seem that the duke of Richmond's commands are disobeyed in Westmoreland. Pontefract, 3 Nov.

St. P. vii. 12. Went to Parma, as he heard that the Pope was delivered. Found Gambara there, who informed him that the general of the Observants had written to the Pope, holding out expectations of delivery. Gambara had sent to Rome for a safe-conduct, purposing to take me with him. He advised my going to Orvieto. Has arrived at Fuligno, but the Prothonotary has not yet arrived. No man can enter Rome without a safe-conduct, still less speak with the Pope in private in St. Angelo. Cannot, therefore, speak to him of your secret: but when the Pope is free, he will, doubtless, do all that he may: and it is not probable that he will be kept long in restraint. There has arrived in this haven a pinnace of Deva in the province of Guipuscoa, Jehn de Rencbana, master, which has taken two French herring boats before Dieppe, by virtue of a letter of marque. Have detained the pinnace here till the King's pleasure be known. The master is going to see the Emperor's ambassador in England, with his letter of marque. Calais, 6 Nov. 1527. Signed.

3558. FRANCIS I. to his AMBASSADORS in ENGLAND.

Will follow the resolution which you have communicated, taken by the king of England touching the ceremony on his acceptance of the Order of France, and that which Francis himself should follow on taking that of the Garter. The English ambassadors shall be received as the merits of his perpetual ally demand, and so that they will return well satisfied. Has heard from Villandry all that has been done about Spain, and is doubly bound to the King and Wolsey. Knowing that they wish those matters to be executed without delay, which were concluded in your presence, I send this courier, in great haste, with letters just received from my ambassadors in Spain, that you may communicate their contents to the King and Wolsey before your departure, requesting them to write to the English ambassadors to adhere strictly to their instructions, without listening to overtures or proposals on the part of the Emperor; and if the sieur De Soysms was named in the powers sent by the Legate, and matters cannot be expedited without him, to write to him to return, and settle the matter with the others; for I am informed they are trying every means to delay the execution of those matters by new proposals; so you must get letters, addressed to the bishop of Worcester and the other English ambassador, to that effect. Is so much pleased with what has been done in England, that he intends sending a gentleman thither to express his gratitude. Paris, 7 Nov.

"Ex literis Dom. Gregorii die viij. Novembris ex Ferrara."

Nothing is yet concluded with the Duke, who says that he is willing to join the League;—but at the greatest advantage and least possible expence to himself, for he only offers 1,500 foot, 50 lances, and 100 light horse. So, as he is not much to be depended upon, Lautrec has been warned to mind what he is about. The Duke's demands are very great. He asks that a Duchess, a niece of the Pope's, who has a great estate in France, be given to his son in marriage. He acknowledges that he has received great offers, and wishes now to make use of an occasion in which his help may be needed, and he thinks it is enough for the League if he desert the Emperor. Has sent to suggest to Lautrec how he may destroy the Duke. Believes God will punish the man. News from Buda. No battle as yet between Ferdinand and the Waywode. Andrea Doria had arrived at Leghorn with the Venetian galleys. He had come for 1,500 foot that were there. Renzi had arrived at Genoa. There is a rumor that the Imperialists had withdrawn into the towns about Rome, and had told the Pope he might return into his palace, but this is not believed.

3562. GIBERTO BP. OF VERONA to WOLSEY.

Although the Pope is very grateful to Wolsey for his services, it is necessary for him to be somewhat particular about what he grants Wolsey, as people are apt to claim for themselves such privileges as are granted to persons of extraordinary deserts. This is the cause that the bulls for the College have not been already expedited according to the desire of the bishop of Worcester, Gregory Casale, and himself. The Pope said he thought that the bulls would satisfy Wolsey, as they were. But on receiving Wolsey's letters of Sept. 30 and Oct. 18, saying that it was necessary that the clause "de fundatorum consensu" should be removed, and also letters on the same subject from the bishop of Worcester and Casale, went again to the Pope, and obtained a promise that they should be re-copied, with the omission of the objectionable clause. The King's late gift of 25,000 ducats made him more inclined to grant this. His Holiness knows the King and Wolsey will consider the dignity of the See Apostolic, which has been outraged by an unheard-of crime, and that they will assist in punishing the perpetrators, who, so far from expressing penitence, threaten worse things, and say that they acted by the Emperor's orders. Are daily expecting the Spanish fleet. Ten thousand Germans, leaving the Turks behind them, are coming into Italy. Rome, 9 Nov. 1526. Signed.

Carew, chief esquire of the king of England, Ant. Browne, knight, and Thos. Wriothesley, Garter King-at-arms, ambassadors from the king of England, this Sunday, 10 Nov., the Order of St. George, called the Garter, with the garter, mantle, habit, collar, and other vestments belonging thereto; that he has sworn the oath prescribed by the statutes, as modified according to agreement between the two Kings,—that is, to wear the image of St. George, the collar and garter, once a year. If on St. George's day he happens to be in a place where he cannot hear matins, or if he has no leisure to do so, he may cause them to be said in his presence by a priest. If he has any important business on that day he need only wear the habit of the Order during divine service, 11 Nov. 3567. FRANCIS I. to his AMBASSADORS in ENGLAND.

Le Grand, iii.

Has received their letters of the 25th ult. notifying the departure of lord Lisle, the Grand Esquire and the Master of the Rolls, to convey to him the Order of the King of England, and receive that of Francis. Has come to Paris in order to receive them as honorably as possible (le plus princièrement et honorablement qu'il me sera possible), and has deferred his intention to go and hunt in Brïs, and see the building he has begun there. Has given orders for their escort from Boulogne, where he has just heard that they will be on Wednesday night, to Paris, where they may arrive on Tuesday or Wednesday following. Is hourly expecting the return of Villandry, whose despatch, he trusts, owing to Wolsey, will be for the good of Christendom and the deliverance of his children; so that upon it, with the Cardinal's advice, we may make our common despatch into Spain, and await a final resolution, preparing meanwhile to obtain by force, if necessary, what we have not been able to obtain by reason.

Sends news which has come this evening by Castillon, whom Francis had despatched towards Lautrec;—to be communicated to Wolsey for the King, who, he has no doubt, will rejoice at his success in Italy. Has provided everything that Lautrec requires, and trusts he will soon achieve the Pope's liberation. Paris, 11 Nov.

11 Nov. 3569. The COUNCIL OF CALAIS to WOLSEY.

R. O.

The Deputy has written both to my lord Chamberlain and to Mr. Treasurer of Calais to show the King the great necessity the town stands in for lack of wheat, malt, and oats, caused by the great consumption when Wolsey was in these parts, and by a number of French fishers who have been continually coming and going since before Michaelmas. The victuallers at Calais are stopped at the ports of England, and not allowed to depart with their corn and victuals. Although Wingfield has written to the officers of divers ports, his writing has had no effect, except at Sandwich, from which they have got some malt. My lord Chamberlain's officers at Guisnes will not allow any rent corn to be brought to Calais till the land-owners there have paid a year's rent due last Michaelmas. Much of the rent corn of Guisnes belongs to inhabitants of Calais. No corn can be got from France or Flanders except by special licence; and the King's coins and French crowns in our hands go so high that nothing can be bought except with great loss. Has discussed the matter with the other two jurisdictions, viz., the mayor and his brethren and the constable of the Staple; and they think to avoid the great peril, the best way is to open the county of Guisnes in such form as it hath been accustomed, and to petition the King and Wolsey to open the ports of England. Malt can only be had from England. Calais, 11 Nov. 1527. Signed: Wyngfield, R. Sir—Hary Planknay, mayor—Crystopher Garneys—Sir W. Husey—Wylliam Denham, conyestible.

"Nova ex Roma, die xliij. Novembris ex Castro data."

There seems to be great difficulty about the agreement between the Pope and the Imperialists, partly on account of tumults among the Germans and Spaniards, partly for want of ready money. When the Spanish troops were leaving Rome to go to the defence of Bracciano, towards Naples, a tumult arose, which John of Urbino, Alarcon, and the marquis Guasto endeavored to appease; but their efforts were ineffectual, and they themselves barely escaped with safety to the citadel. The Spaniards returned, crying out for pay, and threatening to kill the Marquis, but about 500 went into Naples, and laid waste a town of Ascanio Colonna. The infantry cannot remain here long for lack of provisions, especially if the light horse return. Lautrec should come at once, and take them unprepared. A captain has just come from Germany, urging the Germans to leave Rome and come to Lombardy. The Imperialists have determined to send the infantry to Picenum, which is not far from the Neapolitan frontier.

Thanks to God and St. George, all the ceremonies "were done with d[ue] solemnities and honourable expedition of both parties, a[ll] thing as like as could be devised as they were receiv[ed] and had at Greenwich." The King, under a cloth of estate, had on one side three cardinals, ambassadors, bishops, and lords without number. "With great pain I was brought into the chamber by a bish[op], long before the King's coming, and made mine oration with great pain; but I had rather have lost my leg than to have been absent that day. The bishop of Burges in Berri answered me." The garter, the robe, and the collar became the King well; and as he took his horse, Madame "looked out at a window to see the King and my lord Lysley in his abbett. The sight pleased her so well quod commovit ei lachrymas." She is very thankful to Wolsey, and said that "now that she s[aw] both the Kings under one clothing she trusteth th[at] they shall continue in one mind and heart." In the delivery of the garter, my lord Lysley and Mr. Carew have demeaned themselves according to their duty, and entreated me lovingly in this voyage. Hears from his Chancellor that Wolsey is displeased with him (the Chancellor), in consequence of sinister information, and because he has laid claim to a parish church and prebend that Mr. Downman had, and that Wolsey has ordered him not to depart without special licence. Asks Wolsey to hear together the Chancellor and those who gave the information, and doubts not that he will find he has acted uprightly. He has sufficient learning and experience for his charge, and is wise, discreet and circumspect in giving judgments, with good will, diligence and boldness. Does not think there are two men in the shire who will complain of him. Doubts not that he can show Wolsey his title to the said benefices, and that he will be ordered according to Wolsey's pleasure.

Wants his Chancellor daily, and especially for the keeping of his consistories, of which the next will be on the Saturday after the feast of St. Andrew, and for a visitation in the new college of St. Mary beside Winchester. seemed so great, and he promised so little on his side, that it was doubtful whether the ambassadors would not return without doing anything. Sends the heads of his demands. At length the ambassadors thought fit to send Casale's brother, the knight (equitem fratrem) to the cardinals at Parma, to persuade them to ratify his demands in the Pope's name as far as they concerned his Holiness; which was done. The Emperor marvels why all this time he gets no answer either from France or from the King and Wolsey. Some of the Council say 40 days have passed, but the Emperor gives us 16 days more. It is said he will set forward in 14 days for Valencia, and from that go into Arragon, leaving here the Emperor and his council of Castile. Since the news of the Viceroy's death they have been trying many ways to send into Italy. They applied to De Tarbes for a safe-conduct which he had for one to be sent for the Pope's deliverance, but he, fearing they would use it for their own affairs, said he had kept it for some time, and sent it back to France because no man asked for it. Believe they have found means to send both by sea and land. News came on the 15th from France of the Pope's deliverance, whether with or without conditions does not appear. J. Almain says the Almaines keep the Datary and Salviati's father in their hands as hostages for arrears due to them. He says it is they only, and not the Emperor, who kept the Pope in captivity. Almain was much more close than he used to be; "and yet he had of us much occasion; which thing and the despatch of a currey by De Tarbes at this time without any sufficient cause known to us,—albeit he pretended cause to have licence to come home,—maketh us somewhat to suspect."

The Emperor makes no concession about Sforza, except that the Council say when the answer comes they will see what can be done. De Tarbes says he has offered the duchy to the count of Genera. Almain told De Tarbes that Gregory de Casale had said openly to Lautrec, before some of the Emperor's side, that the King would give Francis no more money for the war of Italy. The Emperor will receive from Valencia, Arragon, &c., 600,000 ducats, only if he come there to take his oath. Numbers offer the Emperor 800,000 or 900,000 ducats, to be quit of the Inquisition, "and may stand for their purgation when anything shall be to them objected." The Inquisition is a right great court, evermore following the Emperor. He intends to raise money by mortgaging certain lands.

The duke of Ferrara has joined the league, and his son is gone into France to marry the lady Renate. It is said the marquis of Mantua has turned likewise. Burgos, 18 Nov. Signed.

desire more than themselves. Expresses his suspicions with regard to a courier sent by the bishop of Tarbes to the Emperor, which he thinks indicates a better understanding with the Imperialists than they are willing to allow.

3. Proclamation that all owners of grain who have more than enough for their households shall sell it at the nearest market. Commissioners are to make inquiry in every town and village if there be any corn concealed, and any owner neglecting to bring his grain to market to be reported to the council at Westminster by the quinzaine of St. Hilary; also to inquire concerning persons forestalling, regrating or engrossing, whom the commissioners, being justices of the peace, shall not only try at the next sessions but enjoin to appear before the Council as above. Justices to enforce the statute of Winchester, and other statutes concerning beggars and vagabonds, unlawful games, and putting down alehouses and inns at villages' and towns' ends, idle persons having of late very much increased, which has led to continual thefts, burglaries and murders.

No news since the departure of my lord Lysley and Master Carew. The King is hunting at Fontainebleau, and is expected home on Saturday. My Lady remains here. Has only spoken with her once since he came, for as yet he cannot leave his chamber. Poyner spoke with the King the day he went forth last, and twice since with my Lady, who has informed him fully of the state of Italy, and shown him letters the contents of which he will report to Wolsey. Received letters yesterday for Peter Van from Gregory de Casalis, which he sends by Poyner. It is said that the Pope is delivered. Begs Wolsey's favor touching his prebend of St. Stephens. Has written to his kinsman, Robert Dacres, to deliver a resignation of it to Wolsey. Paris, 22 Nov. Signed.

Galba, B. ix. 93.

R. M.

Since last writing has received no letters of his. On the 25th Sept., after the conclusion of marriage, had tidings of Wolsey's return from France to Guisnes. The next day prepared to come to him at Calais; but on arriving at Bruges, on the 26th, received letters from Calais that he had crossed the sea on the 24th. Returned accordingly to the Court, and has delayed writing till now for lack of matter. Yesterday morning received the enclosed two letters. Seeing that both were addressed by the same man, but that the one for Wolsey was not like the other, either in the closing of the paper or in the sealing, asked the messenger who had broken it, and who had given it to him. He said he knew not who had done so, and said that he received them from a Spaniard who came from Spain and was going to the king of Bohemia. Gave him 4 plocks for his labour. Has heard lately that the Emperor has written duplicate letters to my Lady about the great trouble that the King and Wolsey are taking to make peace between the French king and him, and has sent the copy of all the articles and offers made to him by them and the French king's ambassadors, with his resolute answer, by which he means to stand, desiring my Lady to show them to the great Lords here. My Lady has done this according to his desire, so that there are here now the card. of Luke, lords Rawrystayn, Berghes, Burre, Fyenys, Bewyrs, the marquis of Arskot, now prince of Simay, with the other principal Lords.

Is daily asked to great dinners and banquets, where he hears many discussions about peace and war. Some of the principal persons say that Wolsey is the cause why the King, by manner of mediation, will compel the Emperor to make peace with the French king, greatly to his dishonor. Others say that the Emperor's ambassador in France has written to his master that Wolsey told him it was not convenient for the weal of

Christendom that his master should have all his will of the king of France, for he should wax too great a lord. The Emperor, therefore, supposes that Wolsey wishes to keep him low, if he can. Some, however, say, on the contrary, that the King and Wolsey have showed more love and favour to the Emperor than any other Christian princes, and that if they had not meddled, all Flanders and Artoys might have been destroyed by this time.

On Sunday last dined at Houghstrate's house with the cardinal of Luke, the lords of Palermo, Rawystayn, the earl [of] Porsyen, mons. de Burre, and other young lords. They think that the Emperor will not be content with the Fre[nch king's] absolute offers, and they expect war rather than peace. God send us better tidings out of Spain, and the good people here pray for good tidings from In[gland]. Dined yesterday with the Cardinal, there being present lords Rawystayn and Burre, the marquis of Arskot, count de Porsyen and others. There was no speech but for making of good cheer. After dinner the Cardinal desired him to offer his loving recommendations to Wolsey, saying, "Vous ly puez escrire franquement que il n'y a plessyr ne servicee que bonnement me soyt possible de ferre pour le Roy vostre ministre, ou pour sa bone grace, que me trouveront prest à ce ferre." Thanked him in the names of the King and Wolsey, and promised to write accordingly. This afternoon my Lady asked for news from England. Said he had none, and asked if she had any from elsewhere worth writing. She said the news from Italy was good, and that the king of Bohemia had written to confirm the news she had received on Sept. 27 of his victory over the Waywoode, who fled with 400 horse after the battle. The King's army takes castles and towns daily. She begged to be recommended to the King and Wolsey, and said that now is the time for them to show their love to the Emperor, and she doubts not they can bring all things to a good end, as they know the Emperor's "interior mind and intent."

B. M.

Since his last, has endeavored to find out the reason of the congregation of all these lords to the Court.

As far as he can tell, it was in consequence of certain letters sent by the Emperor to with the offers and presentations made by the French king to him, his answers, and the articles he has sent to the King and Wolsey to arrange a peace, which they now consider here that the King and Wolsey have entirely in their own hands.

Prays God to give [them] the grace to choose the best for our own part and the weal of Christendom. Some in authority think we favor the Fr[ench] side more than theirs. They have concluded in this Parliament to keep their frontiers and towns [safe] from the enemy, and to restrict the exportation of corn and munitions of war, till they know their friends.

Was last night with my Lady in her council chamber, there being present the lords of Palermo and Berghes. She asked for news out of England. Told her there was none but what was good. She said she had heard from the Imperial ambassador that for all the triumph and good semblance the King and Wolsey show to the French ambassador, he does not mistrust their love and favor to the Emperor. She desires to be recommended to Wolsey, but excuses her writing, as the Emperor has written at length, and she trusts that by your Grace's good means all will come to a good perfection. She said that the king of Bohemia had written of his prosperity in Hungary. He had received letters from Antony de Leva stating that he is strong enough to keep the town and castle of Milan for three months, but needed reinforcement from Dutchland to resist his enemies and assist the Imperial army. Ferdinand has, therefore, sent 10,000 men from Ausbourg. A gentleman of credit tells him that the king of Bohemia wrote that he trusts in five months to make an end of the business in Hungary, and he will then go with his whole army to make an end of the business in Italy. My Lady did not tell Hacket this, perhaps because he knows such things are sooner said than done.

The cardinal of Liege, Messrs. de Berghes, Burre and Bewyrs, have been trying to mitigate the anger of my Lady and Hoghestrat against good Mr. Hesdyng; to which she would not listen, unless he would "sou[bmit] himself to prison and to purge." They said that he was ready to answer at all times in the Emperor's great council of Machlyng, and to the procurer general, and would lose his head if any fault was found in him. She said "she had justice of her own to corrige her own servants;" and if the Emperor himself wrote otherwise, she would rather give up her governance than change her purpose; so he must take patience as long as my Lady and Hoghestrat have the governance. A day or two after this, being with the said lords at Berghes' house, the Cardinal told him this in French, and Mons. de Burre confirmed it. The Cardinal then spoke the following words: "Mons. l'embassadeur, je vous sertebye que ce n'est pas Madame que fet la guerre à Hesdyng, mes ce sont des autres espyrte que craynoyent que ledit Hesdyng estoit trop bon Engloyas, les quellys quydeyent mestre quelque jeloysse entre l'Empeur et le Roy votre maystre, et de ferre quelque alliansys avecques les Franssoys, donet quelque grand Maystres de par de sa que je ne voux nener ont este contrayres, et Hesdyng en porte la penence." Hesdyng knows that these lords have told him of the communication they have had with my Lady and Hoghestrat, and asks Hacket to write to Walsey to allow him to come to him.

f. 90.

Encloses two letters from Hesdyng to Walsey and to himself; knows that Hesdyng is well beloved by a party of the greatest lords here, and has matters to show which he dares not write. The king of Bohemia was crowned king of Hungary on the 3rd inst., and the Queen on the 4th, with greater solemnity than others in past time. He writes that he will return to Bohemia, leaving governors in Hungary, and go thence to the journey Imperial at Ratisbon, hoping to arrange then for defence against the Turks, if they attack Hungary next summer. A man lately come from Surry (Syria) says that the Turks are making great preparation to attack some part of Christendom next summer. Thinks Walsey knows already the Viceroy of Naples' death. Now of late of this high council has followed him. Mons. de Rendon, of the French king's chamber, and now of the Emperor's retinue, is here. He says many things that might be kept in silence; among others, that he was sent, when the Turk was in Hungary, to bribe the principal personages in Bohemia with 30,000 cr. not to assist the king of Hungary,—which they did not; that the Regent had sent a special messenger to ask Walsey to persuade the King to send no men nor money thither, in consequence of which the King's money did not come in time. If he can come to speech with him, will examine him somewhat further.

Dares not trouble Walsey with writing of his own necessities, but commits himself to his remembrances. Machlyng, 22 Nov. 1527.

3597. DE TARBES and PRESIDENT CALVIMONT, the French Ambassadors in Spain, to ———.

We have done our best since we wrote last to conquer the difficulties, but are continually put off till the arrival of the courier, whose delay is complained of by the Imperialists. Although they say that it is to determine them to war, and to look to their own affairs, they make no show of abating the difficulty when the resolution comes, especially as to the restitution of the towns taken in the duchy of Milan; but, perhaps, when we come to speak of it, God will inspire them. You will have understood by our letters of 27 Oct. what the sieur de Bouclans said to Poinctz at his departure, that there was nothing the Emperor would not do for England if they spoke apart. Afterwards Nassau asked me, the President, why we did not ask the duchy of Milan for Francis, not for Sforza. Bouclans said as much the other day to me, De Tarbes; but, knowing it was their policy always to sow suspicion, and that if we made any overture to them they would make use of it to their profit with the confederates, we paid no attention to it. They lose not a moment in devising means to find money, and put forth many inventions. 1. They say that there are 90,000 parishes in Spain, from each of which the Emperor can obtain two marks. 2. He proposes to sell his rights in the Spicery to the king of Portugal, who, they say, will give a million of gold for them (and probably he would give some money, if he were assured of the bargain). 3. He proposes to abolish the process by the Inquisition against heretics, and leave it to common law, by which he will obtain 400,000 or 500,000 ducats. It is true this will displease all good men in his kingdom, but for that he cares little. 4. He intends to sell the reversions of the commandries of the Three Orders of Spain; and the conscience of the Spaniards is so good, he will make money by it. Moreover, he means to sell for 50,000 crowns the royal rights called juros, by which he may obtain 500,000 ducats and the revenue of the cortes of Arragon, Catalonia and Valencia. He is going to Valencia in fifteen or twenty days to make his entry, and be sworn in (se faire jurer), whence he will come to Mousson, in Arragon, to hold the Estates. During his journey the Empress and Madame Eleanor will remain here, at Burgos. He has confirmed the revenue of the masterships of the Orders for five years, at 800,000 ducats, and has taken an advance from some Genoese merchants, as of the Santurions, and also from one at Lyons. This Francis must look to. Warn him of various devices used for transmitting money.

The Emperor has great confidence in his brother; and if nothing occurred to hinder it, perhaps his hopes are not misplaced. Cardinal Salviati wrote on 22 Sept. to the Pope's nuncio at this court, that Francis had sent us a blank safe-conduct for whomever the Emperor would send to Rome for the deliverance of the Pope, with orders that we should be hostages for the surety of the person sent. The Nuncio did nothing about it until the Eve of All Saints, when the death of the viceroy of Naples was known here. Then he applied to us for the safe-conduct, which we, considering the state of affairs in Italy, and that the Pope's safe-conduct did not move the Emperor, who would by this means be able to advance his interests in Naples, told him was no longer in our power, because we had sent it back to Francis by the sieur de Poinctz. He pressed us very much, which increased our suspicions. At last we told him that, for the Pope's service, we would willingly despatch a courier to Francis, and ask him to send back the safe-conduct. He then went to the Emperor, and reported what we had said; and we know not if they have agreed together. We have no doubt they mean, under the protection of this safe-conduct, to send instructions to don Hugo de Moncada, with whom rests the charge of the kingdom of Naples until the Emperor has otherwise provided. Various persons, both Spaniards and Flemings, have been named (for the vice-royalty); but it is believed that it will be given to the Count Palatine, which will greatly dissatisfy the Spaniards, especially as the Great Mastership has been given to Gourgon (Gorrevod), governor of Brusse. These here receive and send letters by Munnesque, which you had better look to.

You know the treaties which have been made with England, and what we must come to if the Emperor is not reasonable. We doubt not that, if they really supposed here that words would be followed by deeds, they would not have spoken, or they would have used other language; but they rely upon the English. John Lalemant a few days ago told me, De Tarbes, that the Emperor was sure the king of England would not declare war against him, and was willing to lay a wager upon it with me. He said, besides, that that King had fulfilled his promise about the pay of the army of Italy, as he had been lately informed from Italy. The knight Casalis, in Lautrec's camp, had said so, and that he would not pay a sou more. About three weeks ago one Ponge, a servant of cardinal Casarion, arrived at this court in post from Italy, and went on to England, for what matter we know not,—he says, to get Wolsey to petition Francis that Lautrec should leave Milan, and go to Rome. He came here under a safe-conduct of Francis for six months, and is doing great injury to his interests, pretending that the number of his army in Italy is very small, and giving great hope to the Imperialists. All the ambassadors of the Confederates think he was despatched by the viceroy of Naples. He proposed to carry the charge of the Emperor instead of that of the Pope, and to pass through France with letters from us, which we have dissembled to him. You may judge if he return shortly that he carries nothing of importance, or you can keep him in France for some time. Mention a ship laden with harness, which is going from Flanders to Naples.

Have been a long time without speaking to the Emperor's council, "pour le renvoy que dessus," and for the little hope of peace which they themselves profess. Are waiting for instructions from Francis what to do. On Wednesday last De Tarbes went to some of the Emperor's council on pretence of getting a safe-conduct, required by a harbinger of the Dauphin. Was received like an enemy, both on account of a letter which had been brought from Navarre, by which it appeared that there had been 800 men of Francis's at the capture of Basques, and for the bad news they had from Italy. I spoke them fair until I found it was no use, and answered without anger, that they might see they were only injuring their master's interests. We began talking about the evils of war, and each apologising for his master. The other, at last, asked me to tell him plainly wherein I thought the difficulty lay. I said I knew but one, for I was sure the Emperor would not stick about the hostages, and would be satisfied if he was assured of his due by merchants or otherwise, without talking of those who had been named. This he granted. I said also, that the Emperor would not stick about the Venetians and Florentines; which he also granted, saying he was sure both parties would be reasonable. He then spoke of Francis's refusal to surrender the towns; which I justified, as they were not in his hands. He proposed, and I approved, that the Emperor should do justice to Sforza, and yet show mercy, and that Sforza should remain his vassal; and asked what Francis would propose should be done after his death, about which I had no instructions. He also asked what Francis would give, if the Emperor should give the investiture to the seigneur d'Angoulême. He afterwards said, he wondered that all this while we had not spoken of any new marriage, seeing that Francis had daughters, while the Emperor had one son, and the king of Hungary another. Upon this we had a good deal of talk.

This morning he said he had reported all our conversation to the Emperor, who had particularly approved of the marriages and the interview. Desire instructions on the subject, for if matters come to a war, it is likely to last long. There is here a servant of a foreign gentleman, who continually presses us to write to Francis, that his master will take his part, and that he has great influence in Naples. Since the last courier arrived, they attach great importance to the retreat of the army, saying that Francis had spoken to a gentleman of the Emperor's chamber, who lately passed through France, and had told him that he would in no case withdraw his army, unless peace were made, and the children delivered into France. This, they said, the Emperor would never agree to, assuming a very high tone. De Tarbes replied that the Emperor had no occasion to talk in that strain, for he had only to assign a term for the children's deliverance at the withdrawal of his armies. They report here that the Emperor has appointed captains to send into Sicily and Italy with 8,000 or 10,000 foot, and that they will embark at Calix (Cadix?). The Emperor has asked the merchants of this town for a loan of 40,000 ducats, considering his necessity. They replied, that four or five years ago they lent him 14,000, which he promised to repay with interest, but has not done, and that the amount is thus increased to 28,000 ducats, and that only if he will give them security for its payment they will lend him 10,000 crowns. With this answer he is much disappointed. The Chancellor and don Juan Manuel have been twice with the Pope's nuncio for four or five hours, and it is said they are arranging some amity between the Pope and the Emperor. We are also assured that the Emperor has made change of 100,000 crowns for Germany, by means of the Focars, which has been despatched by two or three ways.

The Pope is content to have intelligence with Mons. de Lau[trec], but it must be kept secret, and rather the co[n]trary said in public, to prevent its injuring the Pope and the King. I have induced the Pope to dissemble with the enemy, and not to deliver Civita Castellana and la Roche de Forly, till he knows that Lautrec is on his way, and he will do the like about delivering his nephews as hostages, which the capitulation compels.

He will not ratify the treaty with the duke of Ferrara, but will temporise with him.

He complains that Venice is the cause of his ruin, and has written to insist on having Ravenna and Cervia. The Signory have sent word to the castle of St. Angelo, that they have occupied them to preserve them for his Holiness. He has ordered me to tell the gonfalonier of Florence that he will take no more trouble about that city, but he will be pleased to see its affairs flourishing.

3599. LAUTREC to FRANCIS I.

The agreement with the duke of Ferrara has been published in the city of Ferrara. Sends a copy of its publication, which, as John Joachim and Casale report, was not made without much remonstrance. Francis had better ratify it as soon as possible, as the Duke's contribution only begins on the day he receives the ratification; and whenever it arrives he intends to send his son Hercules to the French king. It will also encourage the other cardinals to ratify it, if Francis get it ratified by Salviati, who is now in his court. The Duke has already given a bond to pay 10,000 crowns, including 1,000 crowns a month, for the payment of the 100 men-at-arms. He has dismissed George Franspergh and also André de Borgo, who was with him for the archduke of Austria.

Will now see about getting the marquis of Mantua to join the League, which would leave the Emperor no road open, except by the Grisons, and that could easily be shut up. Thinks the offers which Francis proposes to make to him should be effectual, namely, the pension and company of men-at-arms which his father used to have. Ferrara approves of offering him the captainship of the army for the defence of Milan in Lautrec's absence. Does not know if he would accept it; and, besides, the Venetians would have to be consulted. Hears there is great discord among the enemy at Rome. Thinks it strange that the Pope should have made an agreement, such as it is said.

The Venetians press Lautrec to go on. The Cardinals here do the same. Has replied that as he had no news from the Pope since he made the said agreement, he did not think it fitting to proceed, for he had perhaps made this agreement in order to get out of the hands of his enemies, and they might close in again upon him if Lautrec advanced. Has urged the Cardinals to get this town, and others belonging to the Church, to furnish money for the enterprise, but cannot prevail. The Venetians last month only paid 3,500 Swiss, instead of 5,000 as formerly. There was a muster of 7,000 for the month, but they almost all left immediately after. There are 4,500 pays due for the last two months. They decline to pay the whole 5,000 until the 10,000 lanceknights arrive. Parma, 23 Nov.

"Ex litteris D. Gregorii die xxij. Novembris Parme datis."

One of his messengers whom he sent to the Pope has returned. He has had several conversations with his Holiness, whom he encouraged by telling him that Sir Gregory was here with money for the bribe which he desired of him. The Pope intimated that he would grant everything most readily, whenever the prothometary Gambara arrived, and that I might signify this to Wolsey.* I learned afterwards that the said Prothometary had obtained a safe-conduct, and was on his way to Rome with Dr. Knight. The Pope notified to me that the Spaniards would on no account allow me a safe-conduct, as they knew I did nothing but oppose them. Joachim and I have cause hitherto for two causes; first, to gain this Duke (Ferrara); and, secondly, that the marquis of Mantua should, if possible, be sent to the expedition of Milan, to which if besides these hundred lances the French King's title be added, and the Venetians fulfil their compact, the city will be gained in two months.† Joachim and I keep urging Lautrec to go on. He has hitherto alleged innumerable reasons for delay, but now that we have the Duke on our side we shall lose all esteem if we do not proceed. The Imperialists at Rome spare no cruelty. Lady, John of Urbino threatened to carry off the Pope and the Cardinals to Gaeta, unless money were paid him. The Pope replied nothing more agreeable could happen to him than to be killed, and he feared no greater dangers. He has now prepared his mind for death, and the Germans have hanged the hostages.

One article of the agreement with the duke of Ferrara is that the allies are bound to help him, even unasked. But the Duke does not seem to think much of it, if it be not confirmed by the King or Francis. Joachim and I will not leave this city until we have finished the business of the money.

* This passage is marked in the margin, probably by Wolsey.

These Cardinals cannot be got to collect money; and Lautrec, unless it is procured, will lay waste this city. This must be stopped, else these cardinals will make the Pope an Imperialist. Lautrec must be relieved. He is very angry with the chancellor of France, and threatens to kill him. Wolsey should urge Francis to send money. Lautrec implores us to write to the King for the same cause, alioquin in portu Victoria peribimus.

"Ex literis D. Gregorii die xxij. Novembris Parmæ datis."

By letters of the cardinal of Pisa, written in the castle of St. Angelo on the 13th November, it appears there was little hope of agreement with the Imperialists, on account of the difficulty about money, which the Pope could not procure. All the Spaniards have returned to Rome, except 400, who have laid waste two towns of Ascanio Colonna. They conspired together and invaded Naples; but their captains, in fear of their own men, shut themselves up in the castle of St. Angelo. It is thought that the Pope will put off payment for our sake, that we may come sufficiently near to effect his liberation. Lautrec is accordingly urged to go on, and he will do so whenever he hears that those Germans have come into Italy.

The city and also Piacenza and Bologna are willing to advance money to Lautrec;—much to the displeasure of these Cardinals, who would nowise agree to it, as they do not wish this city to be guarded by his troops. Hopes, nevertheless, that means will be found, viz., that count Guido will cause the citadel to be kept by his brother in the name of the Church, and bind himself to allow Lautrec free passage and aid at all times. Has got the Cardinals to promise that they will advance large sums if the practices proceed for having the Germans who are at Rome. For this Lautrec has agreed to send forward the Germans whom we got from Ferrara. Joachim will also go to Genoa to raise 15,000 scudi for this purpose. Dom. Laurentius Toscanus will go in his place with me to Mantua, when this business is settled.

Is much troubled because Lautrec does not go forward. All think he is waiting for a concord between the Emperor and the French king. Fears the Emperor holds out this hope in order to stop the army of the League. The Venetian ambassador, with the consent of the writer, asked Lautrec to decide whether he would go on or stay; if the latter, the Venetians would spend no more money in the expedition, for it would only ruin them. This produced no result. Will go with the ambassador tomorrow, and obtain answer from Lautrec.

Reports from Rome say the Pope is using all his efforts, and implores our progress with tears. Lautrec says he is waiting to be asked by the Pope to go on and set him free. A man sent by count Guido (Rangoni) has just returned from the Pope, begging Lautrec in his name to send the said Count to him. Guido thinks he intends to escape after entering the concord, after which he will enjoy more liberty. The Count, therefore, is going to some place near Rome, with 50 swift horses; and he is so bold and resolute, that if the Pope has any spirit he will escape. He often expresses his wish to serve the King and Wolsey. He is like a brother to the writer, and has offered to obtain any request for him from the Pope. Told him to urge the Pope to grant what Gambara and Knight request. Is waiting to know Wolsey's pleasure, whether, when the Pope is in count Guido's hands, he shall ask him about the commission Wolsey commanded him to burn, or whether he shall get the Count to help on the despatch of Gambara. Says this because Guido has so much influence with the Pope, and will have more if he obtains his liberation.

Has received today letters from the bishop of Vaison, brought from the castle at Rome by a servant of card. Rodolph, and written in the Pope's name. He says that the negotiation with the Imperial army is entirely broken off. The Pope allowed it to proceed, hoping for the arrival of Lautree, of whose slowness he complains, for he is certain of victory if he proceeds. The Spaniards and Germans are at enmity with each other. He thinks the latter could be easily brought to our side, and also the cardinal Colonna and his party. The hostages are in the hands of the Germans, and are treated with ignominy.

The protonotary Gambara has arrived at Rome, about the hat of the Great Chancellor and Wolsey's business. The Pope will send everything as soon as possible, by Mariotti, Gambara's servant. He begged the Cardinals here to send word to the Pope of Lautree's arrival. They all went to him, imploring him to hasten to Rome; but he answered as before, that he could not do so before the arrival of the Germans, who were said to be at Lyons on the 12th. They will probably be in Italy by the end of the month. On their arrival at Turin he will immediately go to Rome.

The cardinal of Mantua sends a servant of his to the Pope to inform him of what is being done here. Has desired him to tell the Pope that Lautree will hasten to Rome as soon as the Germans are in Italy; to warn him not to pay any money till they either give him a safe opportunity of flight, or his liberty, and to assure him that we are daily working for his liberty. Has shown him also how to persuade the Pope to despatch Wolsey's affair, and, when despatched, to give it to Gambara. Hopes the man will arrive safe, "propterea quod ad fratrem dicti cardinalis Mantuae mittitur, qui Roma est cum Caesarianis." Parma, 26 Nov. 1527. Signed.

B. M.

Hears from Inspruck that Andrea de Burgo wrote to the rulers there on Oct. 11 that the duke of Aranea had sent from Sienna to Rome 100,000 ducats, and the Imperial forces are going to free Milan from the blockade.

The bishop of Trent writes on Oct. 23 that a man had come from Mantua, saying that the Marquis had received news that the Pope was reconciled to the Emperor, and he had written to Monsignor de Luerich (Lautree), the French general, that he need not trouble himself further. There is no certain news about the treaty. The merchants have received letters from Venice that some of the Imperialist soldiers have been paid, and they are going towards Milan, but that there is now no fear for Naples. On the 25th,

Friday, three persons were burned at Salzburg who had been rebaptized,—one of whom was a priest, and had been degraded by the Bishop. An insurrection was expected by their fellows. Two women were drowned, and three beheaded and then burnt. These recanted, and died as good Christians. “Ipso die Simonis et Jude [apud W]ysenberg in Ungaria, debebat coronari rex Ferdinandus.”

The Wida is said to have fled to Wallachia.

On Oct. 13, at Oven or Buda, the whole Hungarian nation assembled. Much was said about the treasons of the Wida, which were proved by information received from the Black Man, and by his intercepted letters. Ferdinand is expected in Wittenberg a month before Christmas. He will punish Lutherans and heretics. All Hungary has contributed to his voyage. There is a rumor that the Turk has made a treaty for 10 years with the Emperor. A diet is fixed at Ratisbon for next Lent. Cologne, 6 cal. Dec. 1527.

Colingwood has been executed, a notable offender in March treason, who was brought in by Rob. Colingwood, chief of his name. Many persons were indicted for robbery. Have adjourned their arraignment till the coming of the justices of assize to Durham in Lent; they have not been accustomed to go to Newcastle, except once a year, at Lammas. Hope by Midlent to have a good number of offenders brought before them for an example. Can get little knowledge of the offenders in Tyndale and Roldisdale, but hope, by frequent visits to Northumberland, to establish better rule. Sir Chr. Dacre and Sir Will. Eure have departed to meet the visewardens of Scotland for redress. The gentlemen of Northumberland have behaved well in giving their verdicts and evidence. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 27 Nov. Signed: T. Thanks Gardiner for helping his dispatch. Hopes he will keep my Lord in remembrance of the supplication of the soldiers of Calais, who have now served three quarters of a year without wages, and can get no credit. Begs him to speak a good word for Master Hackett, the King's ambassador with Lady Margaret, whose servant is the bearer of these. Doubts not Wolsey befriends him, but is too busy for the most part to attend to his solicitations. "He would see his diets augmented," having been put to great charge, and has had none to further his causes but Master Secretary and Master Tuke, of whom the one is away from England, and the other has been long absent from the court through sickness. Bertoun, of Ovir Berntoun, and two ships of Lyn, driven on shore at Werkwith and Bamburgh castles, which letters desire Bertoun to bring his case before the Admiral's Court in London. Redress for ships has been made on the Borders for many years. Has sent to the lady Margaret his letter about the ships spoiled by Spaniards, and through them his subjects hope to get redress. Asks him to consult the treaties between the kingdoms for the last 50 years, and he will see that all injuries are to be redressed by the wardens. 3623. RIC. [FOX] BISHOP OF WINCHESTER TO WOLSEY.

Hears from his Chancellor that Wolsey has not complied with the request in his letter sent by Mr. Paulet. Asks Wolsey to allow him to return, as the clerical subsidy must be assessed before Christmas, and he, from the last three years' practice, can do more in fifteen days than any other in a month.
